

VANITY FAIR

Bill Murray Hobbles Around GoldBar; Terrell Owens Raps During Commercial Breaks

by Jessica Flint 2:35 PM, JANUARY 26 2010

The snowstorm that hovered over Park City the last several days left Utah with some of the best powder the state has seen in a while—some runs on the Park City mountain had snow that was knee-deep—so snow bunnies who had been invited to participate in Oakley’s Learn to Ride program on Sunday, when the flakes finally stopped falling and the sun was out, totally lucked out. After fueling up on Muscle Milk, guests including Orlando Bloom, Mark Ruffalo, and Marisa Tomei outfitted themselves in head-to-toe Oakley gear, were fitted with DC snowboarding boots, grabbed a snowboard, and headed to the mountain for a private lesson. We chased the powder in a chic blue jacket and white pants from Oakley’s Gretchen Bleiler line. Despite the fact that the sun was going down as we caught the last lift of the day, the lightweight outerwear, which has clever details such as magnetic buttons and a front jacket pocket that conveniently fits a cell-phone, kept us warm.

The evening’s biggest draw, however—and perhaps hardest guest list to get on—was the GoldBar party. The New York City lounge set up shop at the Sky Lodge on Main Street, where the club transported its Manhattan skull aesthetic to the mountainside V.I.P. room. Bill Murray, who stars in the Sundance movie Get Low, hobbled around on a crutch—he had busted his leg on the slopes—while Tinsley Mortimer and her sister Dabney Mercer threw back drinks in a banquette while dancing along to “Ain’t No Mountain High Enough,” “Build Me Up Buttercup,” and other, well, throwbacks. The party later migrated to (where else?) Tao at the Lift, where White showed up with Lil Jon.