Overall, the issue of conflict remains in Cambodia, despite efforts to address it. The formation of small-scale farmers and the land tenure system remain an issue, especially in the context of contract farming. This issue has been highlighted in the recent study on rice contract farming in Cambodia. The study examines the impact of contract farming on small-scale farmers and land tenure in the country. Key points include:

- Contract farming has led to increased productivity and higher incomes for farmers.
- However, it has also led to the consolidation of land ownership and loss of collective land rights.
- The study recommends improvements to contract farming to ensure fair compensation for farmers and better conditions for contract farming.
