

Millard Erickson said of Douglas Kennard's Classical Christian God:

"I think Doug Kennard has made a contribution in his book The Classical Christian God that needs to be heard. Doug has undertaken quite a project, of uniting both philosophical and biblical considerations, and has demonstrated the competence in both areas necessary to do this. My impression is that this is an attempt to show how the two areas of consideration fit well together when discussing the nature of God. Doug has obvious familiarity, not only with classical but also with contemporary authorities in philosophy, and has also developed well the biblical materials. The chapter on freedom and sovereignty seems to me to be especially strong. Such a combination of knowledge of the philosophical literature and biblical exegesis is not common these days."
