Over time in the video, shot from above, that captures Gilmore’s signature process of creative destruction and intervention, she would print her name and signature over and over again on what remains of the wood and drywall structure Gilmore destroyed. Her process is precise and calculated; the violence is not; the consequences are noteworthy. She has proven to be a difficult capitalize to capture because one of the main strategies of the violence in her work is through the act of destruction, to not only literally but also symbolically and figuratively be the subject of the destruction. Gilmore’s signature is not just a mark of the artist and her work; it is also a call to action for those who witness the destruction. The signature is a reminder of the power of art and the potential for change. Gilmore’s work is a reminder that art can be a powerful tool for social justice and political action.

Out of a city, out of a continent, the video of the destruction of a building in Seattle, Washington, shot from above, shows a cityscape of a city in ruins. The video is a powerful reminder of the impact of art on society and the importance of creative destruction. Gilmore’s work is a call to action for those who witness the destruction.
