Slippery paint

Flagship Performance PTFE copper antifouling is described as being based on non-stick pan technology using a copper-rich, low friction PTFE mixture. It is said to increase hull speed, be easier to scrub and to reduce the amount of poison leeching into the water, because it is not self-eroding. It is also applied quite thinly, reducing build-up of paint on the hull. The paint contains metallic copper and comes premixed in 2.5ltr and 1ltr cans. It is designed for application by spray or roller and to dry extremely quickly, allowing 2-3 coats to go on in a day. The paint is compatible with other PTFE or Teflon systems, but will not go on over other antifouling.

Filler gauge

Knowing just how easy it is to fill a diesel tank too far, resulting in foam all over the place, this tank gauge incorporated into the deck filler has obvious attractions. The 3210-F displays the level of fuel in the tank using a blue LED display beside the filler, but can also transmit its information via NMEA2000 to remote gauges. The LED is self-adjusting to be readable in all light levels from dark to bright sun. The stainless steel filler cap seats on a rubber O ring.

UKHO goes west

The UKHO's West Country leisure folio, now in its seventh edition, covers the area from Falmouth to Teignmouth and includes seven new charts, pushing the total up to 19. Among those new charts are two covering the Helford River. In common with other Admiralty Leisure folios, the West Country one has the required points printed on it for referencing Yeoman plotters, making this task a quick and simple process. Light sectors are also printed in colour to make recognition easier and details of marina facilities and contact channels are given. Alongside the West Country folio is a new one for Oban, stretching from the Mull of Kintyre to the Point of Ardnamurchan and Fort William. The folio contains 28 charts, including large scale ones for anchorages around Gigha, Port Ellen, Loch Tarbert, Ardferr, Loch Melfort, Oban, Firth of Lorn, Loch Linhe, Loch Aline and Loch Sunart.
