Brooklyn Museum Presents Major Survey of Work by Brooklyn Artists On View Tuesday, November 17th, 2015

The Brooklyn Museum continues its long tradition of focusing on Brooklyn-based artists with a follow up to our landmark survey, "Crossing Brooklyn," with a new show featuring works by over forty-five artists who live and/or work in Brooklyn. "Double Crossing Brooklyn: 6th Annual Real Estate Summit," on view from Tuesday November 7th featuring practices that span what Johanna Drucker has called "complicit aesthetics" to Julia Bryan-Wilson's identification of "Occupational Realism" the artists in the exhibition operate in the field of real estate that seek to erase boundaries between art and Capitalism. While most of the exhibition will take place in the museum's galleries, there will also be counter programming off-site in the streets and public spaces of the Brooklyn Museum.

The exhibition has been organized by the collaborative team GreenPearl, founded by members Ryan Slack, Mark Schacknies, and Nima Negahban. Slack is perhaps best known for his collaborative work, "PropertyShark", 2002-2006, and is the lead curator of GreenPearl. As suggested by the exhibition title, "Double Crossing Brooklyn," the organizers have traversed the borough, in search of the area's most successful principals in the innovative field of for-profit creative placemaking. Critiquing notions of diversity, they have selected an almost all white male roster of artists from the same field, to present the burgeoning monoculture within the borough of Brooklyn.

Art Critic Ben Davis has lavished praise on the exhibition, saying "The organizers of the Brooklyn Real Estate Summit are on the front lines of 'complicit aesthetics.' Through their bold innovation of raising everyone's rent, they have found a new and possibly final way to 'dematerialize' the art object for good, by pushing artists completely out of New York."

The show extends the tradition of collaborations between artists and real estate developers exemplified by Lucien Smith's one night "Macabre Suite" and No Longer Empty's "When you cut into the present the future leaks out". The discussion will be continued further in "Agitprop!," the museum's premier winter show organized by the Elizabeth A. Sackler Center for Feminist Art.

Highlights from the exhibition include: David Pfeffer's construction-based practice, "The Next Phase in Brooklyn's Development", Brandon Weber's "The Second Wave: How a New Breed of Innovation will Reshape the CRE Industry Over the Next 5 Years", and Timothy Oberweger's project "There Goes the Neighborhood!" explores the bleeding edge of neighborhood transformation.
