“I think of street art as growing up in a different moment [than graffiti art], a moment of more gentrified cities, where the experience that people have on the streets is of ads and brands, and then people come along and they’re doing this more kind of poppy, ironic, stencil-based, image-based stuff, creating their own brand and taking back space in that way.”