25th Year Anniversary of “The Tell” by Mark Chamberlain

“The Tell” in Laguna Canyon by Mark Chamberlain and Jerry Burchfield 1989

The name "Tell" comes from the archeological term for a mound of artifacts from prior civilizations - buried over by natural elements. This Tell was built (rather than unearthed) as a small mountain composed of thousands of photographs, reflective of the lives of the people who donated images. It grew to 636-feet long and ranged from 36-feet high, dwindling down to the ground, as it undulated across the landscape and dove back into the hillside.

A growing army of environmentalists began constructing a 636-foot-long photo mural called "The Tell" on May 1, 1989 in Laguna Canyon. Photographers Mark Chamberlain and Jerry Burchfield, along with hundreds of supporters, started building the mural - a giant piece of environmental/assemblage art - after three years of planning and months of fundraising.

Since 1989 was the Centennial of Orange County, CA and the 150th anniversary of the discovery of photography, the project would be comprised of more than 100,000 photographs, contributed by people from all over the country. They shared the concern about the survival of the historic Laguna Canyon. At that time, that Canyon was endangered by the Laguna Laurel Housing Project - a proposed suburban tract that would have destroyed the irreplaceable artistic face of the historic beach city.

When completed, the photo mural was a contemporary mound of artifacts and a hybrid environmental art work that reflected the community's past and looked to its future.

The Laguna Wilderness Park stands today where a suburban tract was once planned. The James Dilly Preserve, the site of the Tell, prevails where a final stand once took place in such dramatic fashion."

The sculptural character of the artwork resembled the voluptuous nature of the surrounding canyons, with echoes of a female figure in its shape. It had a stylized Easter Island head as its physical and philosophical foundation.

The pictures, glued onto the wooden framework, were woven together like pixels in a pointillist painting by density, color, content and type of material. They told numerous stories of man, woman and the land. These symbols were positioned by story lines on the chakra points of the larger body of the photo mural.

Go to the Laguna Coast Wilderness Park's headquarters; it is the gateway for recreational users to explore a vast network of linked trails throughout the 20,000-acre South Coast Regional Wilderness. The nature center's picture windows frame four main views into the surrounding parklands, challenging visitors of all ages to consider the wilderness from various perspectives. Call the park at 949-923-2235 for program information.

The History of Laguna Beach, as we know it, actually starts in Laguna Canyon. The first white settlers came from Aliso City, as El Toro used to be known, to the crossroads of El Niguel Creek (El Toro Rd.) & Laguna Canyon Creek, and settled there. The Laguna Canyon watershed consists of 6,020 acres. It extends 6 miles from its border with the San Diego Creek/Newport Back Bay watershed to the Ocean at Laguna Beach.

We know the first inhabitants were the Native Americans, who hunted, fished, and lived in the canyons. We have found their cave dwellings, plundered their graves and destroyed their kitchen middens in the name of progress. We have even gone so far as to dig up their bones and re-bury them again nearby.

Located in Laguna Canyon are the only natural lakes in Orange County. To the northwest of the present road, a vernal pool formed, and to the east, another larger lake believed to be fed by a natural spring formed, giving us two distinct lakes. A 1924 study by a pioneer aquatic ecologist, Dr. James G. Needham of Cornell University, (while on a teaching sabbatical at Pomona Marine College in Laguna Beach) identified them as “ponds”. However, natural fresh bodies of water are so rare in Orange County that we now call them lakes. A vernal pool is one which contains water only during the wet season, but serves a distinct ecological purpose. This one gathers its water from sheet flow.

Laguna’s name comes from the lakes in the canyon, “La Canada de Las Laguna’s.” The “lakes” have been restored under the auspices of the Laguna Canyon Foundation and the Laguna Greenbelt. The original large lake is actually a single “lake”, possibly formed by scour of the original depression by runoff, and the possible presence of a small spring within the lake, spoken of by many older residents. In wet years the lake covers up to 14 acres, and in dry years it seemed to shrink to almost nothing.
