"Laguna Beach Art Galleries, its Perils and Pleasures"

by Richard Challis and Gene Crain moderated by Janet Blake

Richard Challis opened Laguna Studio Gallery, later renamed Challis Galleries, in 1950, Laguna Beach’s first commercial art gallery. His first show featured Leonard Kaplan and John McLaughlin. Prior to that arriving in Laguna Beach in 1946, Challis rented space for a frame shop from Councilman and Temple Hills Developer Harold Reed. Reed owned the property where Ralph’s market is now [at Cleo Street and South Coast Highway]. The first paintings displayed were by Laguna Impressionist Virginia Woolley.

According to former Mayor Ann Christoph's "Laguna Home Companion" "At the time, he [Reed] ran an ice house, and a fruit and vegetable stand. Challis would convert the vegetable stand into a frame shop, buy Reed’s framing equipment, and pay rent, $60 monthly."

E. Gene Crain is a significant art collector. "California Holiday: The E. Gene Crain Collection" was a major art exhibition at the Laguna Art Museum in 2002. The Crain collection includes artists known as the California School including Rex Brandt, Phil Dike and Millard Sheets. The collection began in the early 1960s when Crain met artist Rex Brandt at the artist's home in Corona del Mar.

Fred Trefren

Fred Trefren's great-granddaughter Jean Nemeyer visited the Murphy-Smith Bungalow and allowed us to scan numerous family photographs. Come by the Bungalow and see the binder contain copies of all of them.

From 1947 book by Joseph S. Thurston "Laguna Beach of Early Days" page 99 - 100, Fred Trefren: "A man by the name of Fred Trefren came from the middle west. He got a group of lots on the south side of Park Avenue. He kept a cow and some chickens, finding enough work so that he appeared to be making a good living. Finally he decided to go into the transportation business. He traded what he had for two passenger cars and a truck, and started to haul passengers and freight from Santa Ana, while he would also meet certain trains at El Toro. He was a familiar sight along these roads for a number of years, where he gained quite a reputation as an Irish wit.

The roads were bad, and the demands for repair of his rolling stock were numerous. One at a time his two cars fell by the wayside and found their way to the inevitable boneyard. But the old truck, which was capable of making about ten miles per hour, managed to stay on the road for some time. The seat of this truck was constructed in such a way that it was easy to get out and walk around the flat bed. Then there was a trap door made in a place where it was convenient to open it and look at the gears, which as time went on became more of a necessity.

Traffic in both passengers and freight was light, but if he happened to have a passenger on one of these trips there was room on the seat. However, if he happened to have two passengers, there was room on the platform. If one of the wheels dropped into a chuck hole it might throw the passenger off into the street, but this did not matter much because no one would undertake the trip if they had on good clothes. Even if there had been a railing around the platform it would not make much difference as far as the clothes were concerned.

This old truck could be seen on the road even after its usefulness had vanished, but finally it came to the end of the journey. There was no money or credit for new equipment for transportation, and Fred had to seek other work."
