(Excerpt from today’s show by Tamira Cousett)

Just knowing that my people are with me, and that in the presence of my people, no matter who I’m surrounded by physically that it’s impossible for me to be an imposter because they know who I am even when I don’t know who I am. Even when I’m questioning, they know. And so, tapping in, and being in connection with them is a way of remembering who I am and what the work is that I’m bringing forward.

Amber: Hello friends! And welcome to the Medicine Stories podcast, where we are taking a soul-nourishing, audio journey through the ethers of the interconnected internet, following the luminous guiding light that reminds us that stories, medicine, magic is real, and healing is open-ended and endless.

I am Amber Magnolia Hill, today sharing my interview with Tamira Cousett. We talk about:

- The process of remembering and learning to be in daily, direct communication with those who hold the container for our lives (AKA the Ancestors)
- Embodying the blessing of diverse lineages
- The evolution of Tamira’s ancestral healing journey as a black woman in the south with both African and European ancestors
- And ancestral connection and how it banishes imposter syndrome because you belong with and to your people always
- And a lot, lot, lot more we talk about today.
Amber: But first, some listener feedback from the last few episodes. It’s so, so wonderful hearing from you all and knowing, knowing how these interviews touch people and change their lives.

So the most recent episode, number 51, Maternal Mammalian Ecstasy: The Ancient Hormonal Blueprint for Optimal Birth and Bonding with Sarah Buckley, got such a beautiful response. Jupiter Jones on Patreon wrote:

My whole life I've heard how painful and stressful birth is for a woman, particularly since I, myself, was the result of a difficult pregnancy and c-section. But this episode made me understand how inherently equipped our bodies are for this wild and profound experience. Reorienting my frame of reference to view birth as a joyful and potentially pleasurable experience has me really looking forward to going through that process someday. I'll also never forget 'no hatting, no patting, no chatting'!

And Lauren Miranda on Instagram wrote:

This episode is an excellent resource for learning about the physiological brilliance that naturally unfolds in birth for optimal wellness of mom and baby. Even if you don't plan on giving birth this information is so important. The vitality and future of our species depends on reclaiming wonder and reverence for birth over fear and medicalisation.

And then the episode before, Episode 50 with Rosemary Gladstar: Kneeling to the Earth: Herbalism is Remembering, Amanda, The Wild Tea Lady in the Medicine Stories Facebook:

Lovely. I like to see acceptance that we are all sharing information, old knowledge and some new. Ego has no real place. Just sharing, remembering, and learning. Keep growing organic and loving, tending, and caring for our beautiful land. Always give back more than you reap.

That really is just the spirit of Rosemary and that interview contained. Thank you, Amanda.

And then, Episode 49 with Mariee Sioux, whose music you just heard opening this episode, Grieving the Spirits of the Land and Healing the Ancestors, Annie on Patreon writes:

I listened to the whole album start to finish on a long train ride trying to keep quiet as I cried hard to many of the songs. After that, I saw on Instagram that the new podcast with Mariee Sioux had come out. I am a regular listener of your podcast and each one gives me chills by how synchronistically it is aligning with my life on the particular day I listen to any given episode. When I heard Mariee's music play the first time I listened to episode one that sealed the deal for me on the fact that I was meant to find your podcast. Mariee's music has inspired me as a songwriter and given me a deep connection to the parts of me that I now have more tools to understand though shadow work and very much through the aid of your podcast and all the resources I've found from it and the community around it…
Thank you, thank you, everyone, the four of you whose words I just read, so, so meaningful. It's just what keeps me going. It's just what keeps this podcast happening. So endless, eternal gratitude for taking the time to share and write your responses and just epic love for the folks who do it on iTunes, review on iTunes. It definitely takes some extra steps, but it's helpful in getting the show out there. Thank you. Thank you.

Amber: Let’s talk about today’s Patreon offering because I’m really excited about this one. It is a bonus interview. It’s an extra 20 minutes of Tamira and I talking about Imaginal Remembering and Ancestral Connection. So we talk about:

- the receiving of ancestral memory
- Writing, singing, and ritual as remembering
- Imaginal remembering is a surrendered state of openness that goes beyond the mind
- It’s a spectrum- from small, every day downloads to being deep in ceremony
- How plant medicines can help open our sensory gating channels (from psychedelics to lemon balm tea)
- Decolonizing the mind and how we can all access these realms of consciousness
- Then we touch on skepticism and doubt, and how to know when these experiences are real
- And the etymology of the word “imagination” and upsetting rituals of disconnection by reclaiming our language
- And claiming your human inheritance & gathering all available resources to you

I also, in that post, link to two books related to this idea of “imaginal remembering” or just being open to messages from the otherworld, from the ancestors. From the plants, the animals, however you want to frame this, we’re using the phrase “imaginal remembering.” So you can check that out at patron.com/medicinestories. It’s available for supporters at the two-dollar level. And there’s a TON of other stuff there as well. If you have not yet pledged, and you do, you will just find a plethora of beautiful offerings from past podcast guests related to the things we like to talk about on this show.

Amber: Before we get into it, I just want to say really quickly I mention to Tamira I have, I had a splitting headache during the interview. And I, of course, have talked about my pain on this podcast before. But it’s actually been a lot better in the last couple of months, and so I just wanted to briefly share what changed that for me. And it is the work of Christine Kent and this “whole woman” framework, whole woman posture, specifically.

So I heard about her on her interview on the Honey Talks Podcast. So you can look for that, Honey Talks Christine Kent. It was about uterine prolapse, which I didn’t even know what that was, and “Why Kegels Don’t Work” was the title. And I thought that was intriguing so I listened and I’m sooo glad I did. It’s basically about how we’ve been taught as women to hold our bodies in a certain way, and it’s not the way our ancestors held their bodies, and it can create so many physical problems for us.

So really, you guys, what has shifted this pain for me is just sucking my stomach in, which is very hard to do! After my second child, my body just changed in a way it didn’t with the first. And I’m still reorienting. And so I noticed that I am just constantly sucking it in, even when I’m home. And that really begins a, like, complex process of my body torquing in different ways, and the pain radiating up into my head, and down my back and all sorts of places, but oh my gosh, and when I stand in this whole woman posture, as I am now remembering to do, as I’m standing recording this intro, it changes. And even when I’m triggered, when I’m, like, in a pain space, if I can just stand in the posture for ten minutes it can greatly reduce or even completely get rid of the pain.

So I know that’s gonna help a lot of people out there, so just wanted to mention it and put it in your ear.

And also, I found that when I started working more closely with rose medicine as talked about in Episode 47 of the podcast, and it continues to be that the main form that I’m working with is the scent medicine of it, is my beautiful rose perfume, and that has really helped with like, you know, it’s so softening. And it helps me remember to soften my belly, soften my stance, get back into this more ancestral way of standing which, by the way, includes not tucking the tailbone, which we’ve all been taught to do, especially if you’ve done yoga, or I heard ballerinas are taught this, as well, we just... it’s just crazy. It’s crazy what we’ve been taught, how we’ve been taught to hold ourselves as women to look better with the belly sucking in, or with the tailbone tucking to match these, like, very masculine ideals of how the body should be, especially with yoga and the tailbone tucking. So, dive into that if you think it could help you. And, man, breaking the mental blockages with letting my belly hang out is gonna be, is gonna take some more time for sure. It hasn’t been easy.

And one final thing: Tamira talks about how she just visited her grandmother with her two daughters, and her grandmother was telling her stories about her grandmother, and I just want to encourage people out there, I’ve said this before, if you have living elders in your life, please go talk to them. Please ask them questions before they’re gone. And I encourage you to record it. Record it. It’s amazing. I’ve been doing this since 2010, almost a decade now. And when I go back and watch the videos or listen to the audio, it’s amazing what I’ve forgotten. Or what I’ve learned since then that suddenly makes more sense of the information they gave me back then, the stories they told. So please talk to your elders before they’re gone, and please do yourself a favor and record it.

Amber: Okay, so Tamira Coussett is a practitioner of ancestral and earth-honoring wisdom who is committed to personal wellness in service to greater cultural healing. She is the grandchild of West African, British, and Irish ancestors by way of Alabama, Ohio, and Indiana. She grew up primarily in Atlanta in a loving Muslim home run by powerful women.

The double initiations of motherhood and navigating an interracial marriage cracked her open to sacred grieving and spiritual realities and to the importance of ancestral and cultural healing for living a balanced and resourced life.
Her spiritual path has led her to become a student of Ancestral lineage healing with Dr. Daniel Foor (who, of course, has been interviewed on this podcast twice, Episode 26 and I believe Episode 44. Yep. 44) and a student of West African Òrìṣà tradition in the lineage of Olúwo Fálolú Adésânyà Awoyadé of Òdè Rẹ́mọ. She’s also been very blessed to spend time in ceremonial space with Brazilian earth-honoring traditions. She now lives with her husband, two amazing daughters, and two affectionate dogs in traditional Occaneecchi territory in North Carolina.

Okay, y’all. Umm, anything that I’ve talked about in this intro or that we talk about in the episode will, of course, be there in the show notes under “Links.” And without further ado, let’s listen to the wisdom of Tamira Cousett.

Amber: Hello Tamira! Welcome to Medicine Stories!

Tamira: Hi Amber! Thank you for having me.

Amber: I’m so happy to have you. This is one of those social media connections, you know, where I cam into awareness of you through some posts you had done which were just so eloquent and beautifully written and holding so much wisdom. I was like, “Who’s she?” And just the more I dove into what you had been offering, the more I became enamored of you and your work, so I’m really honored to have you and your people here.

And, yeah, I would love to begin by asking you who are your people? Who are your people? Who do you descend from and how have you come to a point in your life where this ancestral connection and remembrance is such a focus for you?

Tamira: Yeah. So I am the grandchild, the descendant, of people from West Africa, Britain, and Ireland. And so, that’s my web of connection. Those are my ancestors that have and continued to hold the prayers in place for me to be alive in this moment and to walk this earth. They’re holding down the rituals and the prayers of life and living and being on the planet in an incarnate form for me. And they’re a big resource in my life. And yeah.

I’ve always had a very deep connection to them, and even more so after giving birth and having children, I was really called to be in a deeper alignment and a deeper connection with their wisdoms and their ways of being and living on the earth. And so I’ve had visitations from them at a young age in dreams. And just working with inner-knowings and intuition. And then later in life having direct contact with them and experiences with them in ceremony, working with plant medicine. And that is what has brought me to this path of, like, awakening and remembering why I’m here, what I’ve come here to do, and really stewarding over the life of the ancestors returning in the form of my children, and having an awareness and a responsibility of tending to them on the earthside and making sure they’re connected and aware of this deep and powerful support system that we have in the ancestral realm that’s backing us and holding us here on earth.

Amber: So you said you had some experiences as a child. Was this something that was talked about with your parents at all?

I was raised -- and I do want to say, even though I do have diverse ancestry, I’m a black woman. And that has been my experience of being a black woman raised in the South. -- And I was raised by a single mother with twin daughters, and so my mother was very busy working, and she didn’t, herself, have a framework for navigating and engaging in a spiritual realm. She’s one of twelve children. My grandmother and grandfather from Alabama, they have twelve children. And they had twelve children together.

My grandmother was married at 15. She ran away from home to be with my grandfather, who was in the military at 25. And so, it was a hard life. It was really hard. There was a lot of disconnection from family because my grandmother chose to leave and elope to be with my grandfather, and so, having the framework for navigating these conversations of working with the unseen realms was not something that was talked about. Like, ever. Ever.

So those were my little dreams and visionings that I wrote down and kept to myself in my little journals. Things would come through, and messages were written down, but that was something I knew that wasn’t held in my environment for sharing. So, that’s always been something that I’ve kind of kept to myself. Yeah.

Amber: And so, how did the plant medicines act as an opening for you?

Tamira: Oh yeah. That was good. Just thinking about it is giving me a little bit of chills here, because it was if you could imagine coming face to face with your people, and feeling the fierce love and compassion, and also, like, what are you doing? Like, don’t you remember what you came here to do? Like, that. That reckoning in that space and feeling the responsibility and really coming into ownership of the agreements that I made in coming here, that was how they pulled that out of me. It was like this remembering of all this work that I’ve come here to do.

And what am I doing? How am I not living in alignment with their values and their wisdoms? What am I ignoring? How am I ignoring the dreams that are coming? How am I ignoring and not making space and time for honoring the connection and all the ways that they’re attempting to show up and get my attention?

And so it was kind of like, whoa. I’m accountable to someones here. Right? Some greater power’s here. So it was really that. Like, having that vision of direct contact with them. And it wasn’t like, “Oh this is a dream.” It was like, okay. I’m very in my body, and I feel them in my presence, in my space, and not in an invasive way. It was like the kid that like, in the house is tearing everything up and they look up and is like, “Oh, somebody’s watching. Okay. Hi you guys!” (both laugh)

So it was really that, of carving the space to be in connection and communication with them. And that was just a message for me. There are unwell ones, like, what are you doing? You said you were going to come here and help with healing? There’s unwell ancestors in the lineage, and what are these patterns that are playing out in your life? How are you playing out these patterns on repeat? How are you feeding the unwellness? Are you even aware of that?
And so it was a really long night (Tamira laughs) and really having a lot of insight into my life and the ways that I was living into some of the more burdensome and troublesome qualities that were pregnant in the lineages that were feeding the unwellness; an unwellness that played into bigger patterns collectively, right? So really coming into recognition with that.

Amber: Did, I mean, did you welcome it immediately? Were you like, “Oh yes, there you are!” And “Yes, this work is pulling me” or was part of you like, “No. It’s too much. It’s too big.” (Amber laughs)

Tamira: Well, there’s a little bit of both of that. Just the sheer “Oh my God. Is this real? You’re here?” Like that was so welcoming and so, like, I felt the love, and the compassion, and the prayers that are anchoring my life here. Feeling that was amazing. And then also, like, “Oh my God. I’ve forgotten.”

I was really in a grief spiral for quite some time during that experience of all the things, all the time I’ve had in this body that I’ve not been living up to these agreements, that I’ve not been embodying these gifts, that I’ve not been in connection. I’ve not picked up the phone to listen to your wisdom, like, oh my gosh. There’s grief here. So like, acknowledging that.

And also, sitting with the notion of, like, “Oh my God. It’s too big.” I used to have that thought at times, and I’ve been sitting with, more recently, something that they’ve told me which is, “Nothing is bigger than the prayers and the rituals that we’re holding down for your life to exist in the moment. Like nothing surpasses that. We’re helping to create the conditions for you to be here and for you to do this work. Work that you said you would.” So I don’t hold the vision that anything is too big in that way anymore. Because the powers of my ancestors, and the other unknown powers and spirits that are backing my life, I don’t see that anything is bigger than that because they’re creating the conditions for life.

And because they create those conditions, anything that happens in this container is small potatoes compared to, like, anchoring the possibilities and the conditions for this life to exist. So, yeah that was a reality check I had to come to with myself (Tamira laughs) through their wisdom, yeah.

Amber: Yeah, my impression of you is that you are really frequently checking in. Like, actually checking in with your ancestors and bringing your questions to them, and listening and then receiving the guidance and acting on it in a really real way, in the way that our ancestors did with their ancestors, and in a way that so many folks today have forgotten how to do but are yearning to re-learn how to do.

Tamira: Yeah. Totally. There’s not a day that goes by that I’m not in some kind of conversation with them. And I think that it’s important to say that I think a lot of us are all in this process of remembering and that it looks very different for different folks depending on what that modality of connection is. And sometimes, yeah, it looks like me putting offerings out on the altar, and other times it looks like me just being in direct communication with them, offering up gratitude and praise, and it being like a conversation with a loved one, because they are the loved ones and I’m a beloved of them.
So it doesn’t have to be this, you know, sometimes I think it has to be this grand, grandiose thing. And actually, it’s, like, actually no. I just have to pause, and listen, and be in connection. Be in a space of listening, and then be in a space of conversation and dialogue. And so, yeah, on a daily basis always checking in.

Amber: I always say, you don’t have to don your kaftan and light every candle every time you want to check in. Those bigger and deeper rituals are so helpful and anchoring, but it’s so easy and necessary to check in everyday. Just a little hellos and yeah, being still and listneing.

Tamira: Totally, and I think that feeds the connection. I mean, that the larger rituals are beautiful, but also, just the checking in of, like, “Hey!” That’s what’s feeding the connection. That’s how we build trust. That’s how we open up and we become vulnerable: not in the moments where we have, you know, ritual and ceremony set out, but in the everyday ceremony and ritual of being alive.

And it’s so funny because I haven’t really been able to do any big “out there” rituals, aside from helping to support the ancestral healing work and also going to trainings when I have them. I was just talking about this the other day. There was a mother who was like, I really want to connect with my ancestors, but my kids, like, it’s so hard in carving out time. And I was just like, let me just tell you. It would be a dream if I could just wake up, and shower, and make hot tea, and put on a beautiful white gown, and go upstairs and meditate, and pour tea for me and my people, but that doesn’t work. (Tamira laughs) Honoring where you are in life and what’s available and what the resourcing is is super important. And the ancestors have an amazing, at least mine do, have an amazing sense of humor. Then you know, my kids are up here with me like, “Mom. What are you doing? Mom, I want to touch the altar!” Okay. Great. They want the kids involved. They want the kids involved, so making space for my kids in my practice is part of that ritual and ceremony training, right?

Over and over again I’m humbled, and humbled, and humbled over and over again of just like, come back. Come back. Keep showing up. Keep showing up. Strengthen the connection by everyday drop-ins. And yeah, when the ceremony time comes around, great. And if it doesn’t go as planned, that’s great, too, right?

Amber: Right. Yeah, for me, so often the drop-in is just laying in bed at night, exhausted, and the only free moment I have, you know, just a quick hello and a thank you.

Amber: This is reminding of something that a previous guest, Yaya, said, and she was quoting our friend, Bethany, who during a broom-making workshop shared this beautiful idea that in order to move closer to our ancestors, we should do things that our ancestors would recognize. So I think of this as like, cooking food, and tending the earth, and not so much driving a car, typing on a computer. And, of course, raising children is something that they would recognize so, so clearly. I mean, by definition, every one of our blood ancestors was a parent. And so, when we’re in relationship with our kids every day, no matter how mundane the task, like, a Target run or something, we’re still parenting our children in a way that our ancestors would deeply recognize.

Tamira: Totally, and it’s a deepening of that connection. In the Yoruba tradition, Ifa and Orisha, the children are held as the ancestors returning. So it’s that deep remembrance and that connection of like, yes, they are just fresh off of the ancestral realm. They’re carrying wisdom. They’re carrying knowledge. WE need to parent them, of course, you know, because they’re still very much learning and coming into these bodies. But also, they are the ancestors returning. They are the new face of the lineage. SO when we tend to them and have good relationships with them, we’re honoring and deepening that connection to our ancestors because the legacy is continuing. The lineage is continuing through them.

Amber: With your children did you have, or do you have a sense of a particular lineage being held more strongly in them?

Tamira: Definitely my mother’s-mother’s lineage. That’s a really strong, strong lineage for me. It was the first lineage that I worked with, and one that is really almost always in the forefront around connection. And it is very inherent and very present in them.

I oftentimes joke that my eldest is like one of those great-great grandmas coming back. And her birthday is actually the death day of my great-great-grandmother. So it’s very interesting. She’s very much on that path of an old lady in a little kid’s body. (Amber laughs) It’s very sweet.

Amber: That’s awesome.

Amber: And do you -- so, you’re incorporating them into the ritual or the altar however simply that is done. Do you also talk to them about, like, the genealogy, like, “This was your great-great-grandmother. This was where she was born and lived,” and trying to share those ancestral stories that are known to you.

Tamira: Yeah, definitely, weaving them into these threads has been super important. And the genealogy of the predominant sides of my ancestry, the West African side, has been very limited just because of slavery and colonialism and the records that were kept. But the stories that I do have, and the pictures that I do have are really important. And I do weave the children into that, just like my grandmother.

When I went to go visit her this past weekend, and the kids were with me, she was telling stories of her grandmother, who raised her when she was a child. She was also attending to her own mother. So her 104-year-old grandmother was raised in the same space as my grandmother was. So sharing those stories, and talking about food, and connecting to the land, those are all things that I share with my kids, especially, like, landscapes, pulling out pictures. They came from Alabama. This is what Alabama looks like. Let’s have a look at this headstones. Pictures of headstones that I’ve found on the internet through genealogy. So weaving them in so they have some context visually because they’re very outdoorsy little people, has been really important for me. And also weaving in the stories. So yeah.

Amber: And does it hold their interest?

Tamira: Oh my gosh. Yeah. For sure. If anything, if people are struggling with ways to connect kids, music and stories. Kids love music and they love stories. And so, the weaving in of these stories is sometimes -- you know, we make them a little fantastical, and we add some little details in there-- has been a really sweet way of just roping them in. In a lot of traditions, the stories, the medicine are oral traditions in stories and medicines. And so, for me, this is a way of passing that down to my little people and sharing that through oral tradition.

[0:31:53]

Amber: So you have -- you did a talk for the Ancestral Healing Summit called "Embodying the Blessings of Diverse Ancestral Lineages." And it seems to be, I mean, clearly, an important piece for you with the ancestry that you named earlier, and with the fact that you are a black woman in the South, raising children.

How has your understanding of how you hold those diverse lineages has evolved as you have grown into deeper relationship with your people?

Tamira: Yeah, so it's actually been something that's been happening in tandem: holding both or all sides of my lineages has really helped me to deepen, to be in the capacity with receiving blessings, and with receiving the ability to be in connection with my people.

I have a very particular grief experience as being a black woman in the South with racism and white supremacy and all those things in the US, but particularly in the South. In the very beginning, some of those things, like, not coming to grips with my own personal grief around those things, and my own personal experiences, some of those were barriers for engaging with and being in relationship with my ancestors of European ancestry, of British and Irish ancestry. And so, really digging in and leaning in and being present with the grief that I was carrying was super huge, and transformative for me to be able to step back and see that what is happening, yes, there's an individual experience that we’re all having. But also, there’s overall collective themes and patterns that are in place. And so while it’s important that I have my personal experience, it's not helpful if I’m lost and I’m drowning in it because I can’t recognize the grief. And so I cut myself off from the parts that make me whole.

My daughter said a really beautiful thing the other day. She said, “Mommy, a part doesn’t make a whole.” And I’m like, oh my God. You’re so right. We have to have all the pieces online because we're in a space in the world where we need all of our resources readily available. And so the ancestral healing work, coming to terms with that with all of my lineages, and being willing to be open to embodying their blessings, and really sitting with the harms that have come through folks within the lineage that have acted them out on other aspects of my lineages, right? So, sitting with that and acknowledging that has been helpful with me in having a sense of cultural identity and pride in where I come through. Where I come from and what’s coming through me as a result of that, the blessings, to really fully embody them.

And so it’s been really important for me to do that: to be available to have all resources on hand and on deck and to be in communication with all sides of my ancestry and my people, and not just limit that to my lived experience of racism, and all the other -isms, and troubles, and things that have come as a result of white supremacy and colonialism.

Yeah, it's been a big step for me in stepping back and being like, okay as a personal story, a personal narrative. And also, what are the bigger collective themes, patterns that are happening here so that I’m not just totally enmeshed in my personal experience of this?

[0:35:33]
Amber: So, like, healing and empowerment through stepping back and seeing the wider arc of time and the bigger story that your lineages that are carrying forward in you.

It's like having the ancestral lens placed on everything right? Not the personal human lens. But, like, what is the ancestral lens of the bigger arc of time, like you said.

Amber: Yeah. I really appreciate hearing you speak about this. And I think of how often I’ve seen online, mostly people of European descent yelling at other white people, that if they’re anything other than ashamed and hateful towards their ancestors that they’re doing it wrong. And then I wonder how people of diverse lineages holding that piece then? If they're being told they have to hate this half of yourself, this part of yourself...

Tamira: -- I just know --

Amber: ...Go ahead.

Tamira: I just know from my own experience, I did feel that at a point of like, in order for me to respect and honor my ancestors from Africa, I don't want to claim or talk about the European ancestry. That's very much a thing. And it's very much something that I went through. And I just, it feels important to me because I feel like it's a big part of the culture. Often times when we talk about folks with mixed ancestry, at least for myself, and I know for loved ones and family members that share the same ancestry as me, it's been a thing to be like, “I have to pick one over the other. And if I pick one, then I'm gonna be dishonoring this one.” So it's something that I've definitely had to come to terms with.

And just appreciating what you said about “online.” The piece of, like, if you're not feeling anything but ashamed, like, wow. That's something that makes me… it makes my blood boil just a little bit because knowing the ancestral lens, there's rituals of disconnection that are happening. That's what the -isms are. That's what white supremacy, that's what all these things are are rituals of disconnection. So if we further feed them by holding in place shame and hatred and anger, rather than shifting the lens from responsibility, if we are calling in the place of blame, we’re ritually feeding those energies of disconnection, which further are feeding racism, sexism, homophobia, xenophobia.

So we have to be very specific and very intentional when we're doing our work in the world around the cultural ills and harms that are happening. And be very present, first of all, with how we're showing up, and what are the energies and rituals that we're feeding with how we choose to acknowledge ourselves and our people. And I think that's a very nuanced layer and level of the work that people don't have an understanding of.

So, you're not helping anybody. To all the people that hold that, you're not helping anybody by holding that energy and directing it towards yourself and toward your people. It's a really big difference to come from a place of recognition, rather than blame. The energy's very different, and we have to come to this place of acknowledgment of the harms that were done, rather than being in a space of blame and victimhood if we really want cultural healing to happen.
Amber: Oh, I love this framework of the “rituals of disconnection,” and I see a big part of that, too, is just the collapsing down of -- we were speaking about -- larger historical, ancestral patterns into really simplistic concepts today that just don’t look at the bigger picture.

And it reminds me of something you said in that interview that you did, which is that “White and black isn’t ancestry.”

Tamira: … It’s not.

(both laugh)

I’m like, everybody, we know, right? This is a social construct of what is race: What is a white? What is a black? Please tell me because I don’t understand. And it’s so ingrained in our culture, right? To see all of that, just that binary. And I’m aware that there are other races and ancestries, but when we talk about the particular struggles of those that came from Africa, that were brought from Africa here, and those of European descent that colonized the Americas and were participating in the slave trade, that’s the thing, right? That is how our culture is holding race. It is trumping ancestry at this point, and it’s something that we really need to examine, and we really need to look at.

Race, the upholding of race is a ritual in and of itself, right? And so when we’re claiming these concepts of race, and we don’t have a sense of our actual ancestry and our identity in that way, we’re reinforcing the constructs and the systems of race. And so, in order to buck the system and help with the collapsing of that system, part of it is acknowledging the ancestries that are present and not being content and satisfied with the social construct of race and existing within that.

And I’m not saying that it’s going to go away. It’s a big part of the system. But how are the ways we’re dismantling the social norms, the social constructs in our own life, our own world, our own worldview as we move through the world? And a part of that is knowing your people, and who you come from, and where you come from, and not just being limited to that story of “white” or “black.”

Amber: Yeah, it’s… yeah, just, again, a very simplistic framework of when ancestry, itself, and the actual living humans, and individuals, and these larger patterns of these lineages is just so much more complex and beautiful than those concepts.

So you also spoke about harmonizing your lineages in your body. What does that mean? What did that process look like? How did it feel? (Amber laughs)

Tamira: Yeah, it was amazing. Umm, it... So in the process, in the framework developed by Dr. Daniel Foor of Ancestral Medicine, when you have at least two lineages, while there’s an opportunity for those lineages to be braided together or sort of woven together, introduced to one another in this way such that they’re in an alignment and connection and in communication through you. And so that’s a bit about what the process looked like for me.

And I will speak more specifically around, I didn’t have as much blockages when it came to harmonizing my lineages that were of West African descent with one another. But the tricky part with the harmonization came for me in harmonizing those lineages that were explicitly like totally outright European. And not through, like, because of slavery and lack of consent, and things of that nature, that happen in some of the West African lineages. It was hard because there were parts of my body that didn’t feel like they were receiving the fullness of my being in my soul, because there was shame around them, around being of diverse and mixed ancestry.

And so having that peace come online, actually coming into relationship with the ancestors that were of British and Irish descent and really being in communication and connection with them, and opening up to - there is goodness here. In the larger arc of linear time -- I guess, if we want to call it that -- in the span of humanity, there’s gifts there they have to offer, and they need to come online. And there are parts of my body that were shut down and just not in a space of receiving, prior to being in connection with them. And it was amazing. It finally felt like I was a whole. Like, having those lineages in conversation, and in connection, and communicating with one another was amazing! It was so amazing. It was so liberating to have them in communication with one another.

In one of the processes where I had these two lineages meet, two maternal -- excuse me -- my maternal grandmother and my paternal grandmother, those two lineages met. And just a little bit of backstory: so my maternal grandmother, her people are from Alabama. And her great grandmother, yeah, that was raised (well, taken care of, as she was being raised) by her grandmother, belonged to a foot-washing church out in Alabama, when they lived in Alabama. And at some point, she was a slave in her life. But she belonged to this foot-washing church, and there were these rituals that my grandmother told me about, but she didn’t use the language of rituals. She said they would meet out in the woods, and they would hold church out of the woods. And they would wash each other’s feet. They would go looking around for particular plants in the woods. And she’s like, “My mama,” (that’s what she called her great-grandma) “… she could name anything. She knew what all these plants were.” And she was blind on top of that. So she would help with foraging and could identify through smell some of the plants that were out in the woods.

And they would do these foot-washing rituals. And I’ve always had this thing about my feet being on the ground and being clean, right? Walking, but not leaving a mess in my wake. And so I’ve always paid really close attention and felt that lineage very strongly in my feet, anchoring me here on the earth, and making sure that my hands and my feet stay clean. Like, my character’s intact while I’m here.

And it was really beautiful because I had those two lineages meet one another, and they washed each other’s feet. And that harmonization of those lines. And so it was just like this reciprocity of “I see you. We’re in connection. We’re in communication. There’s goodness here, and let’s do this ritual.” And then they washed my feet, both of them. So, having…

Sorry. (Tamira pauses to cry)
... Having that connection to them, and having that practice, and forgiveness, and seeing that modeled to me through the two of them, and then knowing that I get to live that forgiveness, and embody that in my life was really powerful. Really powerful. And it really speaks to the possibility of healing beyond the linear concept of time and space.

And so, that was a particularly strong experience that I had with the harmonizing of those two lineages: having them come online in that way and be in relationship to one another, and for me to feel safe to be in relationship to all the parts of myself in that way.

Amber: Mmm. (Amber briefly pauses)... Sorry. I'm just crying over here, too.

Tamira: It's okay.

Amber: Okay. And so, I think, just to clarify, that your father's mother's people are of European descent?

Tamira: Yeah.

Amber: Oh. That. I mean, that's such... that healing, that vision you had, but also the historical reality of that ancestor of yours and her circle of folks sitting in the woods, washing each other's feet. (Amber sniffles)

Yeah, again, just quoting you, you spoke about how this whole process of doing the ancestral work has really, like you've already said, helped you step out of a place of victimhood and center yourself in an identity that isn't always in opposition and not letting the world assign an identity to you. D

Tamira: Yeah, I think it's really big, and I think it's an integral part of us as humans in being here, in really being here, and claiming the identity of being an ancestor, an ancestor returning, and a child of our ancestors, right? A child of our people and letting that have priority over the identities that the world is going to assign to us.

And I had a really beautiful, I guess, connection or dialogue with my people around this. WE're born into this container of earth, and there's ritual that's swirling around in this container that we come into. And all of the identity that are coming about, that are generated in this container, are tainted with that ritual, right? And right now there's lots of rituals of disconnection that are happening.

And so my people told me in this conversation it's really important that you're anchored in this identity of being a child of your people, of God, and of this earth, of Spirit before you’re so fully anchored in the identities of the world, because those identities are tainted with the rituals of disconnection that are happening. And those identities have rituals that are in place to uphold them.

And so when we assume an identity or one is placed on us, and we're leaning into it, we're perpetuating the rituals that uphold those identities. And when we're holding space for those rituals, then we're not holding space for the ritual of actually being a child of our people. There's not a lot of space and energy devoted to the rituals of being a student and being in a study of what it means to be a child of the earth, a child of God, Creator, and a child of our ancestors.

And so I’ve been very particular -- and I know. Identity is not something that we can escape. I’m very aware of that -- But I’ve also been very conscious of how much of my energy goes towards embodying and assuming these identities within the social constructs that we have versus really leaning into the identity of being an ancestor returning, a child of my people, a child of God, and a child of the Universe, because those are the rituals that I want to be feeding. Those are the rituals that help with healing. That’s to come. SO it’s just being aware of that.

Amber: Thank you, Tamira. (Amber laughs)

I just… this is just so healing for me, you know? And I think everyone that’s paying attention to what’s going on right now in this country, and all the hurt, and all the pain, and all the healing that many people are trying to bring forth, and how kind of confusing, and scared, and convoluted the path forward can seem.

Your words, and especially your vision of your ancestors coming together reminds me of something that Ruby Sales said (and you introduced me to the work of Ruby Sales). She’s been working in social healing movements since the 60s, since civil rights. And in her TEDTalk I watched she said, “Our redemption is tied into their redemption. And we won’t be free until we are all free of this oppressive anger that is paralyzing us right now as a country.”

Gosh. I have… I started this conversation with a headache, and when I sit super still, as I must do to keep my mouth a certain distance from the microphone, the headache gets worse. But it’s so interesting because it tends to happen in conversations like this that are, like, really hitting home. Like, hitting something inside me that needs tending, you know?

Tamira: Yeah.

Amber: So I’m feeling, like, literally splitting pain inside my head, but also, wow, this is so interesting that this is happening as I’m listening to these words from Tamira right now and feeling so grateful for them so thank you.

Amber: And speaking more about embodying the blessings of our ancestors: your words that you have shared on a video and a podcast on imposter syndrome I think they hit me so deeply, and I think that we’re all looking for belonging. We’re all looking for home. And here it is. Here it is in the realm of the ancestors, which is, btw us, and our bodies, and ourselves.

And so, can you share your own experiences with imposter syndrome and the wisdom that your ancestors have shared around that? And how that’s helped you to step into your medicine?

Tamira: Definitely. I love what you said that everyone’s looking for a sense of belonging. And that’s true. And with all the harms and the anger that’s being held in the world, everyone is looking for a sense of belonging, right? And we fall really victim and susceptible to being swept up in the currents of hatred and having these desires of belonging, that we’ll do anything when we don’t know who we are when we don’t have a sense of identity. If we have someone (or a group of people) that are willing to validate us and see us because we’ve not had that experience, then we fall victim to being swept into perpetuating harms and doing really ghastly things in the world.

And so, I just wanted to speak to that because the sense of belonging is really big, and it feeds into imposter syndrome. When we don’t know that we belong to someone, to our people that are praying over us and holding us, oftentimes it can be a really big block in bringing our work forward and into the world because we don’t have a sense of stability and grounding, and a sense of support in what we’re doing and what we’re bringing forward. And so we’re always in question of that, of, like, “Oh my God. Am I crazy? What is happening?” and, you know “Who is supporting this? Am I… do I belong here? How am I allowed to have this gift? So we’re in this space of questioning.

And I actually was more so in that space within the past few months, more recently, and that’s why I did that talk on the short video and the post on imposter syndrome because it was really out for me. It was very clear in holding this work for other people (the ancestral healing work), this is work that I’m supposed to be doing. Like, there is no other way around it. In addition to other things, this is a part of my work. And the part of the gifts of my lineage is being in ritual, is being a ritualist, and tending to myself for healing, then being a vehicle to help other people learn how to attend to themselves and their lineages for healing and for transformation.

And so, my ancestors really knocked me flat on my butt one day. I was just like, “I don’t know if I want to do this. I can’t do this. Who am I to do this? Oh my God. Let me just tell myself all the stories that I’ve been told about myself by the world, by people in my family, let me just sit in here and wallow in all of this, and totally question all the blessings, all the ritual that’s being fed by the ancestors and powers, for me to be alive in this moment.” And I was literally, like, in my imposter syndrome spiral, and I went outside, and it was just still. And it was just so quiet. And I could feel them present for me. In particular, it was my mother’s mother’s lineage because that lineage is really strong for me. And in their fierce and loving-kind way just kind of laid me out, and they’re like, “Do you forget where you come from? Do you forget who is walking with you? You have two feet, but you’re being carried on the prayers of THOUSANDS of us. And we don’t take it lightly when you’re holding this imposter syndrome stuff because we feel like you’re questioning the rituals and the gifts, and everything we’re working really hard to keep open and available to you in this life.”

And so, I am in this place of moving beyond and through that, and a lot of it is just social conditioning, too, of this work isn’t “normal.” We don’t have a framework for it in our culture. It’s like, “Okay, and you agreed to do this. Are you going to be in connection and relationship with us and honoring these gifts that are coming forward in this way? Or are you going to choose to do something else? Are you going to choose to do the latter?” And I’m like, well, I’m not doing the latter, because I’ve been there, and I’ve done that, and it doesn’t feel good.

And I know that I’m accountable to them and their powers, in addition to the ancestors, that I have to show a record of what I’ve done on this earth when I leave this body. And I want to be able to say I met my agreements, my commitments. I did it. I brought it forward. I’m ready for the next step: graduation (Tamira laughs).
It’s come through just knowing my people are with me. And that in the presence of my people, no matter who I’m surrounded by physically, that it’s impossible for me to be an imposter because they know who I am even when I don’t know who I am. Even when I’m questioning, they know. And so tapping in and being in connection with them is a way of remembering who I am and what the work is that I’m bringing forward. I’m present with that and incognizant of that everytime that story comes up for me, just to be like, “Hey. I remember that conversation I had with them. Yep.” If I need to just take a chill pill, I’m gonna do that, and also I’m not going to be that person that’s like, “This is not real. Let me go do something else.”

So yeah, ‘cause it’s really easy to do that. It’s really easy to do that. And I get validation all the time through my people, through the synchronicities, through the signs, through being in direct communication with them through my children who are fresh from the ancestral realm, that are unfiltered that will speak to me and share things with me. And that is enough. That’s enough.

And I think that it’s really important for people who are bringing their gifts online and bringing their gifts into the world, be in relationship with your people. Like, they’re helping to create the conditions for you to be here. They have lived them. AND they have medicine for imposter syndrome. Really good medicine.

Amber: As you’re speaking, I’m reminded of this thing I heard recently which is “Shyness is self-obsession,” and that’s kind of hard, at first. I was pretty shy as a kid, and just thinking about people who are actually introverted (which is not necessarily the same as shyness), but hearing you speak, I can see the truth in that, and that shyness or imposter syndrome are just holding ourselves back.

Thinking we don’t belong, or that we’re not good enough, really is a form of self-obsession (or, at least, being too focused on our individual selves and individual lives). And when we can, again, widen the scope to the bigger story of those who came before us, those whose bodies make up our very body, we can see that this isn’t just about us. That this lifetime and our work here is not just an individual fulfillment journey, but is so much bigger than that. And as you’re saying, we’re held by so many people in our work and in our time being embodied on earth, which is a really difficult thing to be right now.

Tamira: Yeah. Totally. It is. And I just want to reflect back to something… I lost my train of thought here. Let me pause. They’re speaking to me. (Tamira laughs)

Yeah, I think it’s really important to just reflect back like you were saying, the shyness and the self-absorbedness, and individual emphasis because our culture is really big on the individual, right? The individual experience, it’s got to be individual lives, like, the singular person, and really stepping back and having that space for our collective of people that are walking with us, and their medicines, and gifts that are coming through us for collective healing, right? And being a piece and a part of the greater web of life, willing to be humbled into that, knowing that it’s not just your life, right? It’s like the lives of all the others that have come before, and their sacrifices, and their presence, and that’s it’s not just one singular interaction that’s happening in time. It’s, like, these bigger dynamics and interactions that are happening between the ancestors but through us.
And so, really, having the wisdom to be humbled and to step back and to recognize that is really big. It’s a really big and a really important part of the work. I know for myself the imposter syndrome was a reality check and a time for me to be like, “What is this really about?” And some of that was about my investments in the identities of the social constructs that we have. They’re parts of my identity that are really heavily rooted in being this thing, this way, the social constructs that we have a definition for describing people, and no longer really fitting into that. Those things coming into challenge was a part of the imposter syndrome for me.

It was like, “Well, I don’t really fit into that category anymore.” My ancestors were like, “Girl, what category? What? Why do you want to fit into it? Why? Please, can we do something different.”

And I’m just like, “Oh yeah! Also, there’s a little bit of grief there, because that means, like, you know, my understanding of myself is shifting and changing in relationship to those that are around me in a relationship to the frameworks that I do have in place for relating and for identifying myself.”

And so there was space and time for that. And also, just the awareness of “Okay. Take that time. Take that space, and know that the identity that you build here on the earth is not necessarily the fullness and the truth of your identity of being an ancestor returning and that a child of your people.”

So there’s sometimes where we have to step back and say, what is this fear? What is coming up? What is it rooted in? Are there parts of my identity that are no longer valid for the social constructs? Do I no longer fit into those? What’s the shame? What’s the grief around that? How’s that counter-productive to the narratives I’ve been told about myself. Now I’m writing a different narrative. So being present with that, that was another piece of the imposter syndrome.

Amber: Umm. I was very, very touched by a podcast episode you did called “The Sacred Grief of Childhood.” I mean, like, it just took me right back to my own childhood and to the way I wish I had been held when larger, deeper questions and feelings around what it is to be embodied when they came up.

So can you, please, share with our listeners today this story that came up with your daughter and how you held that for her?

Tamira: Yeah, so it was about a year ago. My eldest daughter, who was five at the time, was having some trouble getting to sleep, and she was really. Really tired. But she was, you know, having a tantrum, having a meltdown, and also, was telling me that the theme of death had come up because my partner’s mother had just died four months prior from cancer, and she was saying to me, “Mommy, I’m going to miss you when you die. I’m going to be really sad when you die.”

And so, I just reflect back on my own childhood of, like, “Oh don’t talk like that. That’s not going to happen.” In that moment, I was given this opportunity of, like, okay, how do I get to be there for her and acknowledge that death is a part of living?

So not make it taboo. Not make it weird. And to honor her grief.
And so I sat there with her, and I said, “You know, I’m going to miss you when I die, too. And I’m going to be holding really big prayers that we get to live a really long life and get to be together for a long time, for snuggles, for good times, and for laughter, and all the things.”

And so, in that moment it was super important for me to step outside the framework that I had, that I was raised with because I wasn’t really raised around a framework with grief. The thing to do with grief is to shove it. Put it in the closet. Let’s not talk about it. Go medicate. Go do something else. Go take it out on somebody else, right?

So in that moment I had an opportunity to step outside of that, with the help of my ancestors, being in connection with them, and to recognize that this is my chance now to be witnessed and to be present, and to also give my child a framework for navigating and talking about grief, and talking about death, and talking about living, and what it means to be alive without it being something weird or taboo, or making it so uncomfortable that she doesn’t have a means for talking to anyone about these things; that she doesn’t feel safe talking to anyone about them.

So in that moment, I chose to acknowledge her and hold her in her grief. And she acknowledged that it’s healthy. And I told her, like, grief is a real thing. Grief is a part of life. Grief is a part of praise. Grief and praise is a beautiful saying that Martin Prechtel has (and if anyone wants to Google him, he’s awesome). And he has a really beautiful book on praise. I think it’s called the Smell of Dust on Rain? Something along that title, but it’s really beautiful.

Amber: Yeah, the Smell of Rain on Dust.

Tamira: Smell of Rain on Dust. Yeah, it’s a really beautiful book. And that’s a part of the healing that needs to happen on a cultural level is with our kids. How do we talk about being incarnate? How do we talk about grief? How do we talk about the impermanence of this world? How do we talk about “I don’t know when I’m going to go?” I don’t know when they’re going to go.

And also, like, that is not the end. That may be the end of the incarnate body in this form, but that is not the end of the connection, right? And so the ancestral healing work, for me in weaving the kids in, has been in showing them that there’s connection. There’s something else that is happening. There’s ways of being in connection, and also, it’s okay that you’re grieving the loss of the physical connection before it even happened. It’s not weird. It’s totally… it’s fine, and I’m going to be here for you, and I’m going to acknowledge that and make it commonplace that you have a language and a framework for navigating that so you don’t feel compelled to shove it and to hold it, and to take it out on other people, or to abuse your body through substances or any other thing, you know, that people spiral into when we have unmetabolized grief.

Tamira: And that’s what we’re holding the collective: the anger, the fear, all of it is unmetabolized grief. Martin Prechtel talks about this in his book. It’s like we’re holding generations of unmetabolized grief and is being expressed as anger, as hatred, as all the cultural ills and cultural harms. And so, in being there for my daughter and holding her in that way, that’s my way of being like, okay, and we’re not adding any more to this pile. We’re going to talk about this. We’re going to have a way of metabolizing this and moving through it, and not being worse by it.
Amber: Your daughters are so lucky to have you. I, like I said, I just so wish I had been held like that because I thought about death ALL the time as a child, and really thought about my mom, especially, dying. And would just cry and cry and just be told, “Oh! Go think about happy things!” I was not held. It wasn’t acknowledged that it was real.

And aside from the very important piece of the huge, cultural, unmetabolized grief, there’s also, on an individual level when we tell kids to forget about it, to not think about it, we, of course, deny the reality of death. But then, when it does happen, when there is grief, trauma, pain, loss, death, what I see so often in grown-ass people (including older folks), they’re, like, they’re shocked that it happened to them. And they don’t know how to deal with it at all. And it’s like, man, this is just basic human stuff that we really should -- of course, it’s going to be shocking and awful and so sad and difficult -- but there should be a deeper level of understanding around impermanence and loss as embodied humans. And there’s just not for so many people, and it makes it so much worse when they’re finally the one on the receiving end of that phone call.

Tamira: Yeah.

Amber: Yeah, so I think we can end it here. I like that we tied it back into the children, and that’s another piece that you hold that I really deeply appreciate.

So, please, Tamira, tell people about your podcast and just where they can find you online and dive deeper into your beautiful, beautiful ancestral wisdom that are being brought forth.

Tamira: Yeah. Thank you!

So, my podcast is Git Your Chit Together, and it’s on all the platforms: on Apple Podcast, iHeartRadio, SoundCloud, FMPlayer, anywhere you get your podcasts from, it’s there. And so those are just very short snippets of ancestral wisdoms by Spirit that come through. And I think I share with folks, in general, they’re no more than 5-10 minutes. They’re very short little snippets to digest and dive into.

Amber: I love that.

Tamira: And sometimes the live interviews… yeah, I do, too. At first, I was like, I don’t know! And I’m like, this feels right. It feels good…

Amber: -- It’s so good.

Tamira: … and so I’m like. Okay. You got it. So, that’s the podcast.

And then you can find me on social media by searching Tamira Cousett. And also, you can visit my website www.tamiracousett.com. There’s meditations on there. There’s meditations on the Insight Timer that I’ve written and recorded. There’s teachings, ancestral teachings, as they come through that are placed on the website. And the podcast is on the website as well. You can listen to that through Soundcloud.
Amber: And I also, I’m going to really recommend either on your Instagram or on your website that people watch your video on perfectionism. I think anyone who liked the imposter syndrome piece that we touched on today will really benefit from that as well.

So, okay. Thank you. Thank you SO much, Tamira, for telling these really deep and healing Medicine Stories today.

Tamira: Yeah, thank you for having me. And also, if people are interested in ancestral healing, I’m holding that session work, and that’s on the website, too.

Amber: Yeah, and again, this is through the framework of Daniel Foor, whom my listeners may have heard him on the podcast twice already. It’s a framework that I’ve gone through myself and is so powerful. And Tamira, I can just imagine how beautifully you hold it, so, yeah.

Tamira: Thank you. Thank you so much. Thank you.

Thank you to everyone that’s listening and greetings on behalf of my well ancestors to your well ancestors.
