KÔDÔ: Way of Fragrance is the art of appreciating Japanese incense and involves using incense within the tea room. One of the three classical Japanese arts of refinement, alongside flower arrangement and tea ceremony, KÔDÔ features all aspects of the tradition, from the tools used to the activities performed. As recounted in folk tales, agarwood first arrived in Japan when a log washed ashore on Awaji Island in 595 CE. The people that found the log noticed how splendidly fragrant it became when put next to a fire and alerted local officials of their discovery.

Incense began developing in Japan in the 6th century CE as a result of the Silk Road, at the same time that Buddhism arrived in the area. Although otherwise stated by legend, agarwood officially arrived in 538 CE, included in supplies meant to be used for the construction of a temple. A ritual known as sonae ko was soon established, and kôboku, the combination of fragrant wood and aromatic substances such as herbs, began to be burned in religious ritual. The use of incense continued to grow among court nobility, and fragrant scents played a key role within Heian period court life, and was even featured in the 11th century scroll, the Tale of Genji.
