Our solution to emergency volunteer housing.

When a disaster strikes, relief organizations are among the first to spring into action. With the help of volunteers, they assist with debris removal, clean-up, and basic repairs. Whether these volunteers are associated with community churches or local non-profits, they will inevitably need a place to stay. In many cases, they are housed in a nearby church or high school gym. However, at times, the damage is so extensive that these typically used structures are unable to accommodate volunteers or have been erased from the map themselves. The next best option is usually the nearest undamaged area, sometimes a great physical distance from the disaster site itself.

We believe that the closer the distance between the volunteers’ housing and their place of work, the better the connection to the community and to the job at hand.
