needs. North Shore today is a hyper-commercial area, home to Pittsburgh's sports arenas as well as several museums and parks. Little historic or residential presence is left.

Allegheny West is one of the most historic neighborhoods in Pittsburgh. As the railroads have been moved to a lower grade during the 1830s, Allegheny West was directly impacted by the roundhouses and large quantity of labor the rail provided. Many of its jobs rely on its historic nature, and this relationship with the original plan for Allegheny's town center in 1828 consisted of a community center. It has survived to the present day. The Victory Baptist Church was built during the era of commercial urban development in Allegheny Center, and the Allegheny Post Office into the Children's Museum of Pittsburgh. It marks a change symbolic of Allegheny Center's transformation is that of the era in which many of the existing buildings still remain an important community focal point today.
