The greater horror

By Thomas Broderick

Last year, I had the pleasure of spotting Tippi Hedren, star of Alfred Hitchcock's 1963 film "The Birds," signing autographs at The Tides restaurant in Bodega Bay. She was my second celebrity encounter since moving back to Northern California last year, the first being a certain celebrity chef cutting me off on Highway 12. I later learned that Ms. Hedren's appearance is an annual tradition, and that some of the money she makes from it goes to support her extensive charity work.

Though I've never seen the film in its entirety, I learned the story through multiple trips to the restaurant and the Saint Teresa of Avila Church in Bodega. Even I, who spent the majority of my life in Middle Tennessee, feel local pride knowing these beautiful places are immortalized in such a loved and influential film.

As Ms. Hedren signed her name a few feet away, I examined the two large aerial photographs of Bodega Bay hanging near The Tides' restrooms. Though taken almost 60 years ago, little would be different in a modern photograph. The only curiosity is a dirt path leading to a construction site at the mouth of Campbell Cove. You can't tell much about what's going on there, but in 1963, the site was the star of a greater horror than Hitchcock could have ever imagined.

Drive to Campbell Cove today and there is only a large pond frequented by both wildlife and photographers attempting to capture their majesty. It's quiet, calm and serene. A weathered sign provides information about the history of Bodega Bay and the Miwok Indians. It goes on to explain:

"Late in the 1950s, PG&E acquired property from a local rancher to construct what was to be the nation's first commercially viable nuclear power plant. Construction of the Atomic Park began in the early 1960s, only to be halted by the efforts of concerned citizens in 1964. The proposed location of the Atomic Park was dangerously close to the San Andreas Fault, which was the deciding factor to halt construction. This 'Hole in the Head' is actually a 90-foot by 120-foot deep hole dug by PG&E during the initial phase of the power plant construction."

The Bodega Bay Nuclear Power Plant was proposed as a boiling water reactor capable of generating upwards of 325 megawatts of electricity. A General Electric Mark I containment structure would have covered the reactor, preventing any leak of radioactivity into the surrounding land and water.

Tourists visiting Bodega Bay in June following the release of “The Birds” might have noticed hundreds of helium balloons floating overhead. Deposited over the bay and surrounding countryside, each was inscribed with a poignant warning: This balloon could represent a radioactive molecule of strontium 90 or iodine 131. In an era when nuclear power promised to be the solution to America’s dependence on coal and oil, environmentalists doubted man’s ability to control atomic energy on such a scale. An accident at the SL-1 experimental nuclear reactor over eastern Idaho in 1961, for example, resulted in the immediate deaths of three workers and the release of radiation. To this day it remains the only accident at an American nuclear reactor that resulted in fatalities. The prospect of another SL-1 at Bodega Bay, but on a much larger scale, roused many residents to action. PG&E abandoned the project in 1964.

Though nature was allowed to reclaim the pit at Bodega Bay, the reactor that would have powered Northern California was copied around the world. By the mid-1960s, Japan, undergoing its post-World War II boom, needed to replace its dwindling coal reserves. The country’s sparsely populated northeastern coast was a prime location to develop a domestic nuclear power industry. The first boiling water reactor at the Fukushima Daiichi Nuclear Power Plant went online in 1971. Five more reactors were added over the next eight years. By the mid-1980s, Fukushima Daiichi was producing 15 times the amount of electricity than that what was proposed for Bodega Bay.

Though genius in its time, the almost 60-year-old reactor design could not withstand the 9.0 earthquake that rocked northeastern Japan on March 11, 2011. Two of the six reactors at Fukushima melted down due the combination of the earthquake and the 45-foot tsunami that followed less than an hour later. Hundreds of square miles of agricultural farmland not unlike that covering Marin and Sonoma were exposed to radioactive fallout. Even today, as the Japanese government reassures its citizens that Fukushima’s produce and dairy products are safe to consume, people are skeptical.

In many ways, Japan is a mirror image of California, and seeing such a disaster befall the nation was an unnerving glimpse into what might have been. Yet the Bodega Bay Nuclear Power Plant is not the whole story. The 325 megawatts it would have generated can illuminate over three million lightbulbs. The power would have needed to go somewhere, and its intended destination wasn’t San Francisco.

America was moving to the suburbs in the 1950s, and Northern California was no exception. Even after the Bodega plant was abandoned, plans for the massive suburban sprawl it would have powered in western Marin and Sonoma remained. Marincello would have covered the Marin Headlands with homes and shopping for 30,000 members of the upper-middle class. The Bolinas Lagoon would have been dredged and turned into a marina for the super-rich. Tomales Point would have become home to 140,000 commuters. To connect people to their jobs in San Francisco, three new bridges were proposed to connect Marin County to the city. Behind these plans were investors, real estate developers and county supervisors. No matter their intentions, the result would have wrecked God’s last untouched acre.

Central to this expansion was the 1967 West Marin General Plan. It would have created State Route 251, a four-lane highway connecting Point Reyes Station and the Richmond Bay Bridge. The village would have swelled to 150,000 people, with communities planned for another 150,000 along the new highway.

But, like with the Bodega Bay plant, the forces of good persevered. In 1971, the rallying cry taken up by residents and environmentalists was short but effective: Can the last place last? The general plan was abandoned due to public pressure, and today our communities are still small. All that remains of Marincello is the Marincello Trail and many farms are protected through conservation easements. The Marin and Sonoma coast is still a place we can all visit, but which few can call home.

Fortunately for us, this other world—the greater horror explored here—is just a nightmare. Yet if you still take for granted the rolling hills, the sound of waves and the sight of the Milky Way on cloudless nights, let me leave you with a final image.

Imagine that the last place didn’t last. Instead, you live in the shadow of the cooling tower in Bodega Bay, or sardined in with the 150,000 residents of Point Reyes Station. Maybe you’re one of the lucky ones with a high-rise condo in Marincello. You come home after a long commute to a starless sky. To unwind, you decide to watch a movie you’ve never seen, Alfred Hitchcock’s “The Birds.” As the credits roll, you think, ‘My God, did this place really look like that?’

Bird identification made easy

By Samantha Kimmey

A birder once told me about a bird that came to her feeder almost every morning. She was the kind of woman who talked a little too fast and haltingly, who probably got into birding to make friends but then became so obsessed with the birds that she forgot about making friends. What happened was that one day an American robin arrived with its back streaked in fresh, white bird shit. A few days later, she saw it again, with the shit dried out. Of course, the bird had probably been visiting for a while. But only after it was marked did the woman take notice, and then she really noticed. She told all her birder acquaintances about the bird that came every day, or at least every few days. She thought about inviting them over to watch it arrive, but she didn't think they cared about birds in that way, if you know what I mean. "There he is," she'd tell her husband, and kind of laugh, but it wasn't really a joke, not to her. The bird's returns felt like an acknowledgement or validation; not everyone returns, she said. On the days it didn't come, she wondered suspiciously where it had chosen to feed. Months later, the white was still on its back, though pieces had flaked off. Now it was more a mosaic of shit. And of course it was only a matter of time before all the shit blew away like dust and the bird would be lost to her, just like all the others, she muttered, just like all the others.

Beach day

By Jordan Bowen

I was at Shell Beach yesterday and every man and dad was shirtless, muscled, lithe and watched shirtless, muscled Gabe hold a tiny girl's hand as they stepped gingerly into the freezing, wind-shot waters and watched her back shiver as she was burned with an archetype she will never find Three tall men and women in their underpants stepped with rigid, fearful postures into the water like a family of Polish farmers told to strip and walk to their deaths The cold rebuke of wind, reversed from its usual direction to scour this special day, shot us with sand—a holy exfoliation Around me it seemed they had all at once populated the beach with naked, drunken toddlers and little people squawking in pirate garb A boy's fifth birthday held at a hipster sun-in Us childless lay shivering in ridiculous sunglasses, thirty...one and still in our twenties Young parents stood mindful amid their surging cluster bearing a separate dignity A table erected for hummus and cake, artisanal rum mixed with fermented tea Quiet, cliquish good cheer, a tolerant proximity to our peers Talk of East Bay lofts, Jingtowen and Fruitvale, how it's smart to get in early in Cloverdale, gateway of the vineyard and brewery-bountiful valley, before the new train brings impenetrable unaffordability pioneer it! (yeah!) get in there! studios, art bars, wild parties, then sell high— A wild churning dust devil tore through the beach threw sacks, knitted shawls and caps into the muddy tide pool— an icy torment of sand scattered fresh-picked berries, organic dips, cups of pink rosé— babies screamed, I screamed— sand gritted my teeth and eyes Ah, beach day in perfect West Marin, where I longed for an ugly animal to answer these inevitable children, a hairless cat and an overweight dachshund What a dad I'd be, holding its paw while It splashes and squeals naked in the bay, this mutant my only progeny— children don't see me, they run into and over me washed up on this gravel shore Drape this flaccid sack of debt and gin over the back of a mule, give it a kick— Slowly it climbs the hill, it knows where to take me

Tule elk lament

By Jim Pelligrin

*I*nterviewer: "Dr. Williams, it seems that you want to sleep with every beautiful woman in the world. Is this true?"
William Carlos Williams: "Well, yes, it is."

Do you think I like living this way?
Here I am, minding my own business all summer, eating, sleeping, walking, staring off into space, whatever. Then fall comes around and wham! My testosterone blasts off and I am twisted into a sex zombie possessed by an insane overdose of desire that makes me want to screw every doe in the world and kill every buck that tries to get in my way. Look at me! How would you feel if a 20-pound pair of antlers grew out of your skull so that you could barely lift up your damned head? I look even sillier after thrashing through the undergrowth: a whole bush dangles over me! Perhaps I have—agh, I can't believe this—now I am peeing all over myself on purpose! Disgusting! As if there was any deliberation about anything I do. Dragged along willy-nilly by an idiotic hormone, that's what I am. How humiliating the rut is, and exhausting to boot. Between bashing heads with every other besotted male around, I have to herd all these fickle does so they don't wander off and join another harem. Damn, there goes another one, the slut. And you, you damned fool, go ahead and take her, I'll beat your head in first chance I get! God, now I'm throwing my head back and making the craziest bugling noise you can imagine, somewhere between a demented bird whistle and a dying rabbit. I can't believe this is happening to me! When I am supposed to eat, or chew my stupid cud? Look at me: I'm starving and exhausted. You think I've got it so good? Try being me for a day and you'll wish you never heard the word 'rut,' God knows I do. Then again, I'm told humans are always in rut, 24/7, 365 days a year until the day they die. How can they stand it, that's what I'd like to know. How can they stand it?

The word

By Samantha Kimmey

He knew the word existed, but she was not convinced. A word for coveting a thing you already have. It had eluded him, and no term she conjured was good enough: worship, revere, exalt, love, adore. To covet a thing you already have: Is that to be jealous? she asked. To be jealous is more a state of being than an action, and even so, she'd still be wrong, he explained. Jealousy, like coveting, involves a triangle of sorts: two people and a third person, or two people and an object. That's not what he meant. Once you have the thing, the third point disappears, the triangle collapses. Like a line, the relationship expressed by the word was almost without dimension: just a person and a thing, or a person and a person, finally alone. But, he said, like coveting, the word went just one way; it was only about the first person, not the object, not the other person.

It was funny to her at first, a little game they sometimes played, volleying verbs back and forth in bed in the evening, instead of retreating into their respective books: she into fiction, he into biographies and histories, the alleged truth about real people and real events. But sometimes at breakfast she glanced at him as she flipped an egg and she knew he was thinking to himself, without her, about the word, a word that might not even exist, searching for it in the reaches of his hungry mind. She always said he had such a keen memory; if the word were real, would he really have lost it? She buttered his toast, arranged his meal on the plate and prominently placed it in front of him. He wasn't paying attention. He kept looking and looking for the word, and she prayed he would never find it.

Ain't misbehavin'

By Scott McMorrow

Once upon a time, there were these guys that would paddle board out to the dead center of a 500-acre ducking hunting area, set up shop, and skybust everything that flew past. We're talking long shots. Sixty-plus yards and straight to the plug, emptying their guns every time. Some days they'd wear blaze-orange hats, hoping to push the birds up even higher. They did it for one simple reason: revenge.

Tomales Bay Ecological Reserve has never shot well for ducks. That didn't stop me from organizing some pushback when a local group tried to close the spot to hunting. Here in California, public lands hunters have limited options, and I didn't want to see another area get axed. Plus, the place was basically in my backyard. The effort to shut it down was spearheaded by a local activist. For the sake of this story, let's call her Tina.

The paddle board boys knew Tina lived within earshot of the hunt zone, and they made sure she heard shotgun reports. Lots of them. During the first season this went on, I talked to these hunters. They were hard-working guys frustrated by what they perceived as an onslaught of anti-hunting gains recently made into law, like the statewide lead ammunition ban and the closure of a prime public duck-hunting zone in the famous Upper Butte Basin. For them, the entire anti-hunting movement was personified in Tina. And they full-on intended to bug her with shotgun blasts while the area was still open.

Like I said, I talked with them during that first year. But I didn't ask them to stop. Not because I agreed with their actions; I didn't. They weren't breaking any laws. I just wasn't comfortable telling them what to do.

Can hunters police themselves? The question nagged at me during the off-season. I know we're not a monolithic group, though some would paint us that way. We come from all walks of life, with differing opinions on everything from religion to recipes. We do share some common traits, though. A love of the outdoors, passion for what we do. Many of us are fiercely independent and don't want to be lectured to. Sometimes I think this independent streak can be our own worst enemy.

The effort to keep the area open to hunting was enjoined by a lot of folks, including hunters statewide, Ducks Unlimited and the California Waterfowl Association. We had our petition, and the other side had theirs. We also had support from many local non-hunters. Without local support, it would have been another us-versus-them issue. Instead, we had people saying, "Hey, we don't hunt. But we support those who do."

The time would come for both sides to present to the Fish and Game Commission, and this non-hunter support would be crucial. My worry was that we'd lose this local backing if the boys came back the next season and continued their antics.

Hunters are outnumbered. The latest information I've read puts the number of folks who hunt at around 10 percent nationwide. Some states have slightly more, some states less. I've also read that about 10 percent of the population is actively opposed to hunting. That leaves 80 percent of the people in this country up for grabs. Those are the people I keep in mind when I think about responsible hunting, and the way we are portrayed in the media.

How can we get and keep those 80 percent on our side? For starters, we can talk with them, let them know hunters are not savages. We can let them know that what we do is actually good for wildlife and the environment. Our way of living provides vital funding that purchases and restores vital habitat that is otherwise rapidly disappearing: wetlands. And we can behave responsibly while in the field. Not just because people are watching us, which they are, but because it's the right thing to do. Our actions speak for us. So we need to ask ourselves: What is it we want to say?

Hardcore waterfowlers like myself love getting ready for the opener almost as much as we crave the opener itself. But as the next season approached, I had mixed feelings. If the guys came back, I had decided to make my case and ask them to stop with the skyscraping.

So the next October came and they renewed their shotgun protest in earnest. I didn't know how it would play out, but I sucked it up and approached them to explain the situation as I saw it. Hunters and non-hunters were working to keep the place open. We risked losing the non-hunters if we misbehaved. And you know what? They got it. Spot on and right away. These guys didn't want to do anything to hurt our sport. Far from it. In the end, it was a no brainer and they stopped with the bugging Tina thing. To this day, we see each other out there and smile about the whole deal.

So, can hunters police themselves? Yes, maybe. Depends. One thing seems certain: we have to try. Without the effort, we're lost. Hunters that do behave, but who say nothing to those who don't, are condoning bad behavior. And that will come back and bite us. Our actions speak for us.

Scott McMorrow is an avid hunter, fisher and forager. He's also a hunter education instructor with the Department of Fish and Wildlife, and is on the Public Lands Hunter Committee of the California Waterfowl Association.

The new you

By Samantha Kimmey

The new you will be more social; everyone says life is better and happier that way. The new you will read more books about the economy and indigenous cultures and art history and Shakespeare, so that the new you is smarter. The old you isn't sure how to balance these goals but the new you, you are sure, can figure it out, since the new you will be so much better than the old you. The new you will spend less time staring at screens and clicking from one thing to the other for many hours. It's one of the things that is bad for you, and the new you can live longer if she is not always in a chair staring at screens, and what in the world could be better than living longer? The new you will stop letting the lettuce wilt, or perhaps stop buying lettuce altogether; you are still getting a handle on the new you, but you are sure she will figure it out. The new you will take up new activities. The new you will switch out these activities every few months, so that when someone asks what's new, there will always be an answer; something about what you do will always be new. This is so people will admire the new you. The new you will become spiritual. The old you has tried and failed to do so, but the new you will find a way; so many other people have succeeded that, really, it can't be that difficult to have faith in something, anything; maybe the new you can research which system is easiest and most satisfying to believe in. The new you will travel more, so the new you has more new things to talk about. The old you did some traveling but forgot about a lot of it, so the new you will need to have a better memory and be more organized and prepare interesting stories to tell, or be able to make one up if she continues to struggle to remember. The new you will also, and the new you will, and the new you might as well and the new you must and the new you will be ready to and the old you hopes that the new you, and the new you will certainly know how to, and the new you the new you the new you the new the you new the you new you the you new you the you the new
