Investigating future smart cities and how tracking & surveillance impact us all DATA CITIES focuses on smart city visions for the future, addressing the implications of new data policies and analysing the unintended negative consequences of tracking and surveillance to our privacy and freedom.
The use of smart technologies and tracking apps has become part of a crucial debate during the COVID-19 pandemic and the cause of controversies surrounding data protection. As we increasingly use connected digital platforms to extract enormous amounts of information, our cities will need to employ artificial intelligence programs and machine-learning algorithms to process it all. But this same data is proving to be extremely lucrative in the hands of big tech corporations.
Technology embedded within everyday objects, with its ability to collect and share data on a large scale, is profoundly changing the structures of urban systems and lifestyles. The COVID-19 crisis has pushed social control one step further, with increased monitoring via tracking devices, drone technologies and security infrastructures. How will the continuing development of smart technologies affect human rights and individual privacy?
This two-day conference will be followed by a day of practical workshops, linking the talks with hands-on sessions by activists, artists, and communities of tech experts in Berlin and abroad.
