Patios, Walkways & Retaining Walls

Spring, summer or fall is the ideal time to plan and install porches, patios and walkways. And, is your property on a grade? A retaining wall can help you to reclaim lost space. Would you like to see that slope being used for something other than sled riding? Terracing it with retaining walls can create level areas that are not only perfect for planting beds, but much easier to maintain. Retaining walls can be built in a wide variety of sizes and materials, including natural or cut stone, treated timbers and precast blocks in assorted colors and textures. For maximum strength and durability, precast blocks are likely to be your best bet. They're engineered to interlock with each other as they're laid, and most have a built-in "setback" to give the finished wall a slightly slanted angle for added stability. If your wall is going to be over 4' in height, additional reinforcement is needed. One option is known as a "geogrid," which is a woven, long-lasting mesh material that interlocks with the retaining wall and anchors it to the soil mass behind it. Careful engineering and design are very important, especially if your retaining wall will be supporting major structures on your property. Consider all of the construction materials available, and choose a design that blends in well with your property while addressing the uses you have planned for the area. Properly designed, retaining walls can add graceful architectural elements to your landscape while improving its overall usefulness. You may be surprised to learn just how functional your landscape can become!
