Andrew Jackson, Deputy Chief Executive, Ministry of Transport New Zealand

Andrew Jackson has been the Deputy Chief Executive of the Ministry of Transport since August 2011. He leads the Specialist Advice and Strategy Group in the Ministry.

He was previously Deputy Secretary in the Ministry of Economic Development where he was responsible for policy relating to regulation of financial markets, company law, intellectual property and competition law and trade tariff policy.

Prior to that he worked for the UK’s Chief Scientific Adviser Sir David King on UK science policy and helped lead the UK’s Foresight programme, which used science to help tackle challenging issues such as obesity, drug use and cybercrime.

Outside of work, he is a father of four, and enjoys water sports, from kayaking to swimming and scuba diving.

Transport, time for change?

This presentation will consider the uncertainties ahead, the possible changes we might see and what that means today for how best we might prepare for that future.......!
