Talks and encourage Pyongyang to open up to the world

Jerome A. Cohen wants to see the US drop economic sanctions against North Korea and revive academic and business exchanges as a way to spur progress in six-party talks and encourage Pyongyang to open up to the world.

On Thursday, December 19 announcement of Kim Jong-il's death has stimulated another round of useful speculation about the United States about how it and other nations might respond to this latest development. But there is a lot of uncertainty about what is likely to happen under the new leadership in North Korea and what the suggested policies are likely to be.

Tidewater and Bight: Chinese heritage

Understanding China’s current emphasis on culture despite the huge problems confronting North Korea is a complex issue. What is certain is that the United States should not be precluded by Pyongyang’s current policy of self-imposed isolation from a sustained effort to establish diplomatic relations.

Moreover, as experience with China and the increasingly successful Chinese model, seemed two weeks of frank discussions made clear that there was no preclude a sustained effort to establish a similar relationship.
