Tom R. Reed is a consultant in communications, public relations and digital media. He co-founded the China chapter of the International Public Relations Association in 1994. He has been a consultant to the Hong Kong Baptist University, the City University of Hong Kong, the U.S.-Asia Law Institute in New York and the Chinese University of Hong Kong. He is a frequent writer and commentator on China and Hong Kong affairs.

T he core of Hong Kong's political culture is respect for the rule of law. This is the basis for both its stability and its distinctive tradition of public order. But it is also the pilar the protest movement has attacked. Has the tradition of public order been undermined?

President Barack Obama and Prime Minister David Cameron are to meet at the recent US-UK summit to discuss a new global security strategy in the face of terror. The strategy is based on cooperation and the sharing of intelligence, in exchange for greater security. But it is also about what is possible.

This year marks the 100th anniversary of the International Business Machines (IBM) company. IBM has a problem: With the world entering the age of social innovation, the company needs to redefine its role. Its leadership needs to look beyond profit maximisation and consider society's welfare.
