When it comes to political and economic rights, the gap between law and practice is growing dangerously.

The Obama faro y Latin America

China's legal system remains subservient to the communist party-state's Soviet model to facilitate and reflect China's unique characteristics. This is because of the party's continued preference for the Soviet system, which it considers to be more conducive to the country's development. The party-state's commitment to this model is strongly influenced by the leader's ideology and the need to maintain control over the country's political and economic systems.

The party-state's ideology is rooted in the belief that the Soviet model is more effective in promoting economic growth and social stability. The party-state's commitment to this model is further reinforced by the leader's personal political beliefs and the need to maintain control over the country's political and economic systems.

The party-state's commitment to this model is strongly influenced by the leader's ideology and the need to maintain control over the country's political and economic systems. This is because the Soviet model is considered to be more effective in promoting economic growth and social stability. The party-state's commitment to this model is further reinforced by the leader's personal political beliefs and the need to maintain control over the country's political and economic systems.

China's legal system remains subservient to the communist party-state's Soviet model to facilitate and reflect China's unique characteristics. This is because of the party's continued preference for the Soviet system, which it considers to be more conducive to the country's development. The party-state's commitment to this model is strongly influenced by the leader's ideology and the need to maintain control over the country's political and economic systems.