Let's be clear: what's best for our economy

Voices: Hong Kong

Ko Ling
Don't deny children the great outdoors

Ko Ling: Have you ever noticed that Hong Kong children spend a huge amount of time indoors? Whether they are reading, hanging out with friends or even playing sports, our children are playing and growing up under the roof of high-rise flats. It is time to rethink this status quo. Our children need natural light and fresh air to thrive.

In the past, though the Hong Kong government has not taken any measures to mandate children to get some fresh air and some sunshine, it has introduced a number of initiatives, such as lowering the minimum age of compulsory education, Howard Lee, a professor of early childhood education at The Chinese University of Hong Kong, said in an interview with a local newspaper.

People's Opinion: Hong Kong

When sparks fly

One of the major demands of the Chinese students who died frequently was the policing of the police and some police violence. Many people believe that police violence is a major problem in China. One reason is that police are often not properly trained or disciplined. Another reason is that police are often not held accountable for their actions. This can lead to a cycle of violence, where police abuse leads to more abuse, which is then punished by more abuse.

The Chinese government has made some efforts to address police violence. For example, it has established a system of internal investigations to look into complaints of police misconduct. However, this system has been criticized for being ineffective and for not being transparent. In addition, police are often not held accountable for their actions because they are not subject to the same laws as civilians.

Voices: Hong Kong

Ko Ling
Don't deny children the great outdoors

Ko Ling: Have you ever noticed that Hong Kong children spend a huge amount of time indoors? Whether they are reading, hanging out with friends or even playing sports, our children are playing and growing up under the roof of high-rise flats. It is time to rethink this status quo. Our children need natural light and fresh air to thrive.

In the past, though the Hong Kong government has not taken any measures to mandate children to get some fresh air and some sunshine, it has introduced a number of initiatives, such as lowering the minimum age of compulsory education, Howard Lee, a professor of early childhood education at The Chinese University of Hong Kong, said in an interview with a local newspaper.

People's Opinion: Hong Kong

When sparks fly

One of the major demands of the Chinese students who died frequently was the policing of the police and some police violence. Many people believe that police violence is a major problem in China. One reason is that police are often not properly trained or disciplined. Another reason is that police are often not held accountable for their actions. This can lead to a cycle of violence, where police abuse leads to more abuse, which is then punished by more abuse.

The Chinese government has made some efforts to address police violence. For example, it has established a system of internal investigations to look into complaints of police misconduct. However, this system has been criticized for being ineffective and for not being transparent. In addition, police are often not held accountable for their actions because they are not subject to the same laws as civilians.