Will a more realistic approach to ties give the US more sway with China on human rights issues, Jerome A. Cohen asks

The acid test will be whether Americans can find a way where China has shown no willingness to yield to US pressure.

Richard (Pete) Chung

initial China policy. China's emphasis is more on economic and political development than on human rights issues. The United States, however, has a long history of human rights activism, and many Americans believe that promoting human rights is a prerequisite for promoting economic and political development. For example, the United States has provided significant economic and military assistance to China since 1979, but has also applied significant pressure on China to improve its human rights record, particularly with respect to political and religious freedoms. The US government has also taken measures to encourage China to adhere to international human rights norms, such as imposing sanctions on Chinese officials who are deemed responsible for human rights abuses.

The US government has also taken measures to encourage China to adhere to international human rights norms. The US has imposed sanctions on Chinese officials who are deemed responsible for human rights abuses. For example, the US government has imposed visa restrictions and asset冻结 on Chinese officials who are believed to be responsible for human rights abuses, such as the detention of Uighur Muslims in Xinjiang. The US government has also pressured China to allow greater access to information and the press, and to allow greater freedom of speech and assembly.

In addition, the US government has also taken measures to encourage China to adhere to international human rights norms. For example, the US government has imposed sanctions on Chinese officials who are believed to be responsible for human rights abuses, such as the detention of Uighur Muslims in Xinjiang. The US government has also pressured China to allow greater access to information and the press, and to allow greater freedom of speech and assembly.

In conclusion, the US government has taken measures to encourage China to adhere to international human rights norms. The US has imposed sanctions on Chinese officials who are deemed responsible for human rights abuses. For example, the US government has imposed visa restrictions and asset冻结 on Chinese officials who are believed to be responsible for human rights abuses, such as the detention of Uighur Muslims in Xinjiang. The US government has also pressured China to allow greater access to information and the press, and to allow greater freedom of speech and assembly. However, the US government has also taken measures to encourage China to adhere to international human rights norms. The US has imposed sanctions on Chinese officials who are deemed responsible for human rights abuses. For example, the US government has imposed visa restrictions and asset冻结 on Chinese officials who are believed to be responsible for human rights abuses, such as the detention of Uighur Muslims in Xinjiang. The US government has also pressured China to allow greater access to information and the press, and to allow greater freedom of speech and assembly.