During the holiday period, many Hong Kong residents are expected to head to Thailand for a vacation.

Although there have been reports of the Thai government's travel alert, it is no surprise that many Hong Kong residents still desire to travel.

The government's travel alert has been in place since last week, when the Thai authorities issued a travel warning to the Thai public and Hong Kong residents.

The government's travel alert states that tourists should be cautious of the current political situation in Thailand.

In addition, the travel alert also warns against the use of social media and online platforms for posting travel-related information.

However, there have been reports of social media users posting travel-related information despite the government's travel alert, which has raised concerns among Hong Kong residents.

It is important to note that the Thai government's travel alert is not an official travel warning, but rather an advisory issued by the Thai government.

In conclusion, while the Thai government's travel alert is not an official travel warning, it is still important for Hong Kong residents to be cautious of the current political situation in Thailand and to follow the government's travel guidelines.
