Charlie Norman and his crew don't pull any punches. They aren't afraid of hard, dangerous work. They like to have a good time. And what they do for a living is one of the coolest ways to make a buck. Charlie and company tear down log cabins – sometimes they rebuild them, sometimes they use the rare wood from these historic structures to build something else. Either way, it's a hell of a good way to make a living.

Log Cabin Fever is a new television series that combines the best forms of experiential television – great characters, stunning, off-the-beaten-path locations, on-the-job danger, financial risk and mindblowing finished builds.

These guys are right out of central casting. Sure, they're a bunch of good 'ol boys, but there's more to them than pick-up trucks and bluegrass music. Their leader, Charlie, talks with a backwoods accent, but he's one of the smartest guys around.

Each week, Charlie and his crew load up their gear which includes a lot of heavy equipment and head out to God-knows-where. They tear down log cabins, barns, churches, old mills, whatever needs to be removed. It's not easy. This is not run-of-the-mill demolition work. The locations are usually far from main roads. There's no electricity. There's no running water – and no bathrooms. Charlie and the boys are completely on their own.
