hello, Moon.

my bed is a red-eye,
all easy eyes that catapult me into tomorrow.
usually the pillows let me rest,
let my bones feel as if they are
melting and spreading like soft caramel
in gloved hands,
while a burnt béchamel lining my sclera.
a truth to be told.
whispers of lullabies sit on my chest
like a ghost with an unfinished promise,
weighing me down,
a dumbbell of sickly sweet payasam*.

Lay Your Ghosts to Rest

Maret McWhorter

Creative writing

If she wasn't familiar with the crash-site, she doubts she would ever have been able to find it.

Completely concealed by the brush, she has to push all of her weight against the sealed door to heave it open again. The light falls across the tiled floor and insulation, faded from a brilliant white to a dull gray by the years. Immediately, it's obvious flora didn't have nearly as much trouble permeating the hull, decorating the walls and falling from the domed ceiling in long tendrils. It takes a moment for her eyes to adjust to the half-darkness, crouching in the doorway to listen out.

Swiftly, a robot comes shambling around the corner, mechanics crying in protest and dulled with a heavy rust. It was one of the last designs for her fleet, she remembers bitterly. The newest, shiniest thing on the market.

She stares at it, preparing for an attack, but the robot nods at her, clicking politely at her. Polite, it's been a long time since she's deemed any of their machinations as polite.

It leads her further into an open room, with a massive center console already flickering to life. A familiar character lights up the screen as it registers her presence and already she has to force down the churning of her stomach at the sight.

"Commander, you're still alive!" it chimes happily. "Al- Li, Li, Li-" The program lapses and stalls as it circles itself into a loop. She waits impatiently, her hand tightening on the scabbard at her side. Finally, it seems to sort itself out. "-live!"

"Yes," she says tiredly. It's somehow worse than she imagined, being back. She wishes she could have stomached it sooner, to return and slash the solar panels to pieces. Erase this single tie to someone she had long left behind, a planet she had long left behind. She shakes off the thought, nodding to the robot at its side. "Have you been the one... scaring...? Off the villagers?"

"The locals of this planet?" it asks lightly. "Why, yes, I've been sending our sentries out to run reconnaissance!"

The Automaton, the locals have named them, entirely too out of place on this world. "Yes."

"Of course!" the hologram smiles, swimming across the dim glow of the console. "Only to defend the ship while I awaited your return! Now we need only to recuperate power and collect the necessary parts to achieve lift-off. I've tracked the greatest energy sources planetside, if we could approximate the location here--"

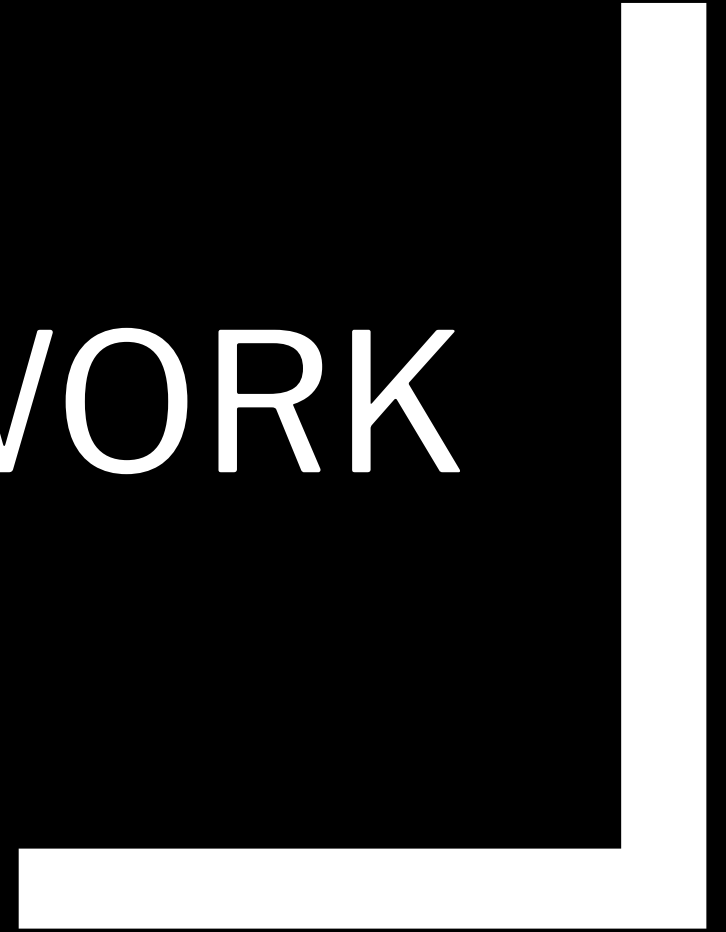

She tunes it out for a second, blinking up at the screen. The map that beams down on her is only in pieces, loose landmarks of the countryside she has come to know and love. The villages aren't marked, certainly not any people either. She thinks of the shepherd's family on the mountainside there, the home of the sweetest roast she's ever had the pleasure of trying. The property is marked in a burning red 'X,' the artificial light searing through her corneas.

"You'll have to harvest ore through there. I imagine the local species will be... averse to the action, but it's necessary. Oh, and we'll have to print you a new uniform," it gestures at her. She sweeps her hands over her heavy cloak, aged and well-loved. "What you're wearing... functions as is. But you need something more practical."

She forces herself to look away. "Is the main interface still operational?"

THE SUN, WATER, AND EARTH

haiku compilation
Luna Reichert | 11

I was a mere seed.
You brought me to the sunlight,
Nourishing and warm.

You fed me water,
But you were the red clay pot,
That became too small.

My roots found the Earth,
And my stem began to grow,
Blossoming alone.

I Would Walk 500 Miles... Black Lives Matter

M

High Five (Left) The Black Panther's Revolutionaries Atlanta Chapter stood proudly as they hold up their fists high in solidarity to the black community and those who have unfortunately lost their lives due to racism. The Black Panthers spoke on how the most important thing people need to do is to spread the love they have in their hearts onto others, no matter what race they are. The group then interacted with the crowd chanting "Say his name!" and the crowd responding with "George Floyd!" Following the chant was an 8 minute 46 second moment of silence to acknowledge how long George Floyd was pinned to the ground in May 2020 while a police officer pushed his knee against Floyd's neck, causing him an inability to breathe and to later lose his life. The police officers are awaiting trial in Minnesota.

Thouging in Pains (Right) Long time friends, Justus Kuykendall (12) and Ezra Adams (12) attended a protest together as a pair and this only made them feel more passionate about their presence at the peaceful protest. Being a part of a biracial relationship, whether it be romantic, professional, or a friendship takes having an open mind and being open to learning from their black counterpart as well as uplifting them to amplify their voice during the Black Lives Matter movement. Adams reflected, "Obviously, I have not experienced the hardships like Justus has had to go through, but I understand that he, and black people as a whole, have dealt with discrimination as a whole, [and] have dealt with discrimination constantly, which is why I was out there beside him." Kuykendall brought a different perspective to the duo. He said, "I was pretty angry going into the protest, as I was thinking about all the injustices that have been taking place in the world. It was great to see my friend [who is white] have a similar passion as [I do] and wanted to stand with me and not be silent. By doing that Ezra solidified the respect I already had for him."

Move as One

Protests took place all across our diverse city, ranging from the City of Atlanta in front of the CNN Center, to Decatur Square, to Ponce City Market, to your local neighborhood. People joined together to spread love and acceptance for black lives. March Loftin (12) protested safely in many Atlanta locations. She said, "There was power in moving as one body on major Atlanta roads and stopping traffic. I think we forced people to look up and realize a movement that is greater than all of us." Having protests all throughout our community proves the unity we have as a city. We all have similar crossroads that allow us to come together and exchange ideas and passions that will allow our community to grow and thrive in a safe space for all.

In Your Corner On the corner of North Decatur Road and Haygood Drive stood members of Emory Presbyterian Church (right next door to the school) who advocated for racial justice by holding handmade signs. They collected waves and cheers from passing cars. The Reverend of the church, Andy Actor, commented, "As a church we need to send a message that racism is not okay and that black lives do matter. There needs to be equity and equality throughout our community."

"I don't notice my mask anymore. I'll be at home for ten minutes and not realize that I still have it on. It's become a new normal for me."
Matthew Cheek (10)

Identical twins Jamie and Nathan Gruwel (10) begin their second year of high school with a new normal. The brothers were hard to tell apart, so many students and faculty mixed up the two. Masks made it even harder to tell the boys apart. However, their friends and teachers used one clue to help. "Masks have made it a little bit more difficult to tell Nathan and I apart, mostly because it covers up half our face. Though people usually tell us apart by what color sweatshirt we wear so not too much of a difference. It is about a 50/50 chance someone gets us mixed up," Gruwel said.

Connections

After deciding to attend a new school, Abby Calhoun (10) enjoys new friends in her Health class. Calhoun had a different experience than most do on their first day. Since the pandemic struck, she had to find ways to make new friends even though she had to distance herself from her classmates physically. As the year went on, Calhoun found that making friends was not difficult even though everyone had to wear masks. "I thought it was a little weird to wear masks and have conversations when it started, but now it is just a habit to put it on," Calhoun said.

protective perspective

Although school resumes in-person classes, some clubs and programs struggle to figure out the safest way to meet. Choir was one such club. Kaleigh McGary (12) and the rest of the choir had to adapt to the new COVID-19 guidelines that required wearing a mask while singing. While this was a huge adjustment for many students, it also helped them. "It has definitely helped me with my breathing and focusing on that, but it has also made things difficult for sure," McGary said.

FRAMING OUR

"Assata Shakur is the definition of perseverance and persistence. She has always been for equality across all racial groups and is never afraid to speak her mind."
Tyesha Ridout (12)

"Alice Walker because I love to read, and she inspires me to think about what I experience and what I see as a Black individual, and be able to express that to other people who may not experience the same things."
Kenned Malone (11)

"Kobe Bryant has been my icon ever since I was little. He had a relentless work ethic that I admired, and he accomplished so much on and off the court."
Andre Akinyemi (11)

"My dad. He was a Vietnam veteran and he was very active in the desegregation movement in my hometown. He instilled in my brother, sister, and myself a good work ethic, and understanding that just because certain barriers have been placed in front of you does not mean you don't have the strength to overcome them."
Cathia Mann, administrator

"My black hero is Jaden Smith. I think he is a visionary and an icon and he is just the embodiment of Black excellence."
Chionem Ugochukwu (11)

"John Lewis is my personal icon because of his unconditional dedication to the fight for equality and the way his story continues to inspire."
Celene Bennett (12)

"Jay Z, because he was able to make a name for himself even though he had nothing and he was also able to teach and mentor those principles that he learned growing up."
Tia Ajayi

Celebrating Icons During Black History Month

"Black History itself is a time to recognize the trails that have been blazed by my fathers, and mothers, and brothers, and sisters. I know that we have a month dedicated to reserve these achievements and pay homage to the people who have come before us. But I like to think of Black History as more than just a month. I like to think of it as past present and future. Black history is right now. There are people in this world, Black individuals, who are doing things to change the way that we perceive black and we think of Black. There are Black individuals who try and use their creativity and gift to change the world in ways that can't even be articulated yet. So it's honestly a time of both reflection and inspiration. Look to the people around me to see where I have been and see where I can go."

"I think the point that started this acceptance of myself as a Black American was starting my platform @ShyConscious. Pressing for people to embrace their heritage or engage with different perspectives. It really made me carve out space in my own life and in my own time to accept the perspectives that I engage with, and that I possess." Kenned Malone (11) said.

Malone is also one of the owners and creators of an Instagram platform known as "ShyConsciousMedia," along with her best friend Tyesha Ridout (12). She uses this platform to spread awareness and educate people on matters of social injustices that extend beyond typical rhetoric. "One day over quarantine, my best friend, Tyesha, and I were just on Facetime having a conversation about the death of Alton Arbery, and how it felt different, and how we really wanted people to be able to talk about an instance like this. We were just discussing how the context surrounding Alton Arbery's death was volatile and unceded for. We were doing so in such a way it was cordial and we were able to just keep changing ideas and kind of build our thought processes off of each other, and we wished that other people could engage in that conversation. And in my mind when I was thinking about other people, I was also thinking of non-Black people, really wanting us all across identity spectrums to be able to come together and speak about ideas like this, and happenings like this, and so we decided why not make a club about it. When we found out we weren't going to be back in school later that year, we just decided to take that same energy and put it on an Instagram platform for everyone to see," Malone said.

Lessons Learned

With her students listening and learning from the other side of the world, Courtney Osborn teaches young Chinese children the English language basics through an online education company called VIPKid. Osborn initially heard about the opportunity from a close family friend who was also a teacher for VIPKid. She prayed to God, asking Him if teaching these young kids was the plan that He had for her. VIPKid offers complete customization to all the teacher's classes to accommodate their schedules. Because of the significant time difference between the United States and China, Osborn realized that applying for this job would perfectly fit her life. "I am an early morning person, so it just fit well into my lifestyle. I didn't want a job where it was going to take time away from my kids when they are home," Osborn said. During her sessions, she has to incorporate multiple props because of the language barrier. For her young students to fully understand what she was teaching them, she had to be very visual and repetitive until her students relayed the information back to her. "The students have what is called TPR, Total Physical Response, so I have to do a lot of acting to try to be as physical and concrete to them as possible," Osborn said.

What was your most difficult class in high school?

Veteran assistant, Hope Thompson dresses as a nurse for Medical Monday to match one of the four total themes during homecoming week. Thompson previously borrowed scrubs from the school nurse to go all out. "The scrubs were very comfortable. Every day was easy to dress up for. The themes were broad, and I felt that anybody could find something that would fit in with the themes," Thompson said.

While referencing Hebrews 5:12-14, Angela Floyd teaches her junior Bible class while handing each of them a jar of baby food. Floyd wanted to show how immature it would be if Christians ate like newborns every day without any advancement to solid food. She explained how God warned us about falling away and not growing deeper in our faith. "I hope they left my class with a memorable impression to move deeper into God's word," Floyd said.

LIFE IS A HIGHWAY... meet my car

HELLO
my name is
Eddie

In March of 2020, Mikey Kriegbaum (10) received a 1994 Jeep Wrangler. Although the car was a gift, Kriegbaum was required to pay for any updates and vehicle changes. He updated his new ride by having it painted black with a dark green wrap. Wanting to name it, Kriegbaum decided upon the name Eddie because he liked the sound of it for a Jeep. Kriegbaum always kept Eddie clean and washed it all the time. Kriegbaum enjoys driving in the morning and listening to country music while driving. "My favorite memory of driving Eddie so far was learning to drive with my dad because the Jeep is a manual," Kriegbaum said.

HELLO
my name is
Houston

In June, Josie Shope (12) received a 2005 Dodge truck from her grandpa as a birthday gift. Even though the pickup was a gift, Shope had to put a decent amount of money into it herself. After finding an old Whitney Houston cassette tape in the car, Shope decided to name her car Houston after the iconic singer. Shope's favorite aspect of her truck was how tiny and cozy the inside of it was. The best memory she has with Houston is jamming out to her favorite songs with the windows down. Shope's favorite song to play in the car is "Heart's Content" by Brandi Carlile. Shope depended on Houston for practical reasons, such as getting to work, school, and volleyball. "The bed of the truck is really useful because my dad and I like to take our kayaks to the lake," Shope said.

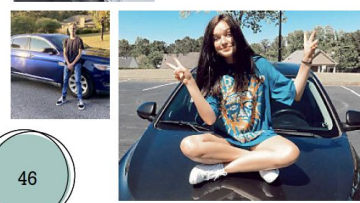

HELLO
Charlotte

In July of 2019, Madison Beavers (11) received Charlotte as a gift. The white 2018 Chevy Equinox has been a reliable ride and kept Beavers out of harm's way from car accidents. Beaver's trunk was full of all the things that she needed for riding horses. Beavers kept pens, napkins, water, a first aid kit, jumper cables, and a rain jacket in Charlotte; you name it, she probably had it. Although she was not an expert on cars, Beavers could jump off her vehicle when the battery died and change a tire with her dad. "My favorite time to drive is super early in the morning between 4-7 am. I have to do that a lot for horses," Beavers said.

DID YOU PASS YOUR TEST ON THE FIRST TRY?

"When I realized we got to decorate our cars, I was so excited. I was excited to make my car a little more colorful and write all fancy for my senior year," Ava Little (12) said.

riots & rallies

On January 6, 2021, large crowds gathered to hear President Trump speak at his "Save America" rally. However, after the speech, the rally turned into a riot. A large group marched from the site of the rally to the U.S. Capitol Building, and hundreds of people broke into the iconic building, hoping to "stop the steal." At the same time, Congress members were in the process of certifying the electoral votes that would officially make Biden the new president. "No matter what side you're on, or if you think the election was rigged or not, breaking into the Capitol was not acceptable," Gavin Lucas (11) said. Many high-ranking government officials' offices, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's, were raided. In the end, five people were killed, and 246 were arrested. "I am a supporter of peaceful protests. This was tragic, but I'm glad more people weren't killed or injured," Lucas said.

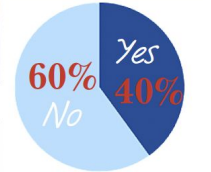

changing the world
one vote at a time

Exercising their right to vote in a historic U.S. presidential election between Joe Biden and Donald Trump, several seniors go to the polls for the first time. Many described the election as being scary, surprising, chaotic, and even crazy. One student noted that it was an election between two completely different Americas. The election sparked intelligent conversations between friends about their views on politics. "It feels strange being of the age where I can vote. Growing up, voting was always something my parents did, so thinking that I can vote now seems unreal," Emma Fitts (12) said. Most new voters were excited to exercise their new right. "I went at 6am on the opening day of early voting," Samgrayson James (12) said.

Do you keep up with politics?

Los Angeles Times

The Washington Post

If I was the President...

"I would first try to make the country more stable by making it more safe and calming everything down. I would create a plan to make things peaceful."

"The first thing I would do if I were President of the United States would probably be to change the education system."

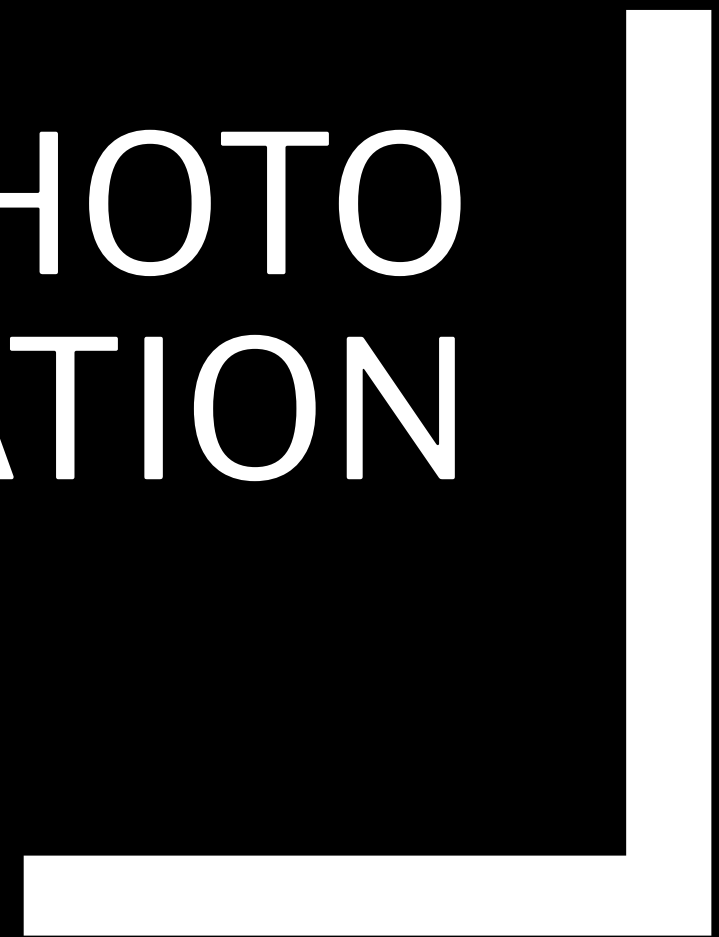

"The first thing I would do is make the legal driving age 17 because teenagers aren't the best drivers and can make stupid mistakes."

OPPOSING

Believing it is time for a change in our country, Margaret Milcoff (12) looks forward to a new administration. Milcoff watched the election results with her mom throughout the week. "The first thing that came to mind was satisfaction when the results came in. I was not surprised by the outcome. I mean Rome wasn't built in a day, so it will take time. My hope for the future is that we can sustain ourselves better than past generations and grow and spread God's glory. I'm excited about our future," Milcoff said. Milcoff also learned something new about people who preferred a different outcome. "They are very dedicated to their cause and believe it full-heartedly. I believe everyone can have their own opinion, and politics should never get in the way of relationships," Milcoff said.
