5.3 Ethics, Lifestyles and Environmental Movement

"Any claim to care or improve the world involves profound changes in lifestyle, models of production and consumption, consolidated power structures today govern societies" (John Paul II). So a deviant anthropocentrism leads to a deviant lifestyle. In addition, environmental movements defend the integrity of environment and demand limits to scientific research. We are asked to establish an open and friendly dialogue between the different ecological movements, due to the seriousness of the ecological crisis that requires us all to think about the common good and move on the path of dialogue (Papa Francisco). We intend in this section to promote reflection on new lifestyles that respect nature establishing a sincere and friendly dialogue with established environmental movements that have positive experiences in life styles that respect the environment and consistent with the moral principle of Christianity
