MERCY'S GARDEN 2019

These series of watercolors were started in my Pasadena Studio where I run a Fellow's program at Brehm|Fujimura Studio. One of the students, Mercy, became involved in one of the capstone projects for creative expressions, but she did not have a particular expression in the arts. One of my colleagues at the center found out that she is an avid gardener, and suggested that she does her capstone thesis with a garden as her creative expression.

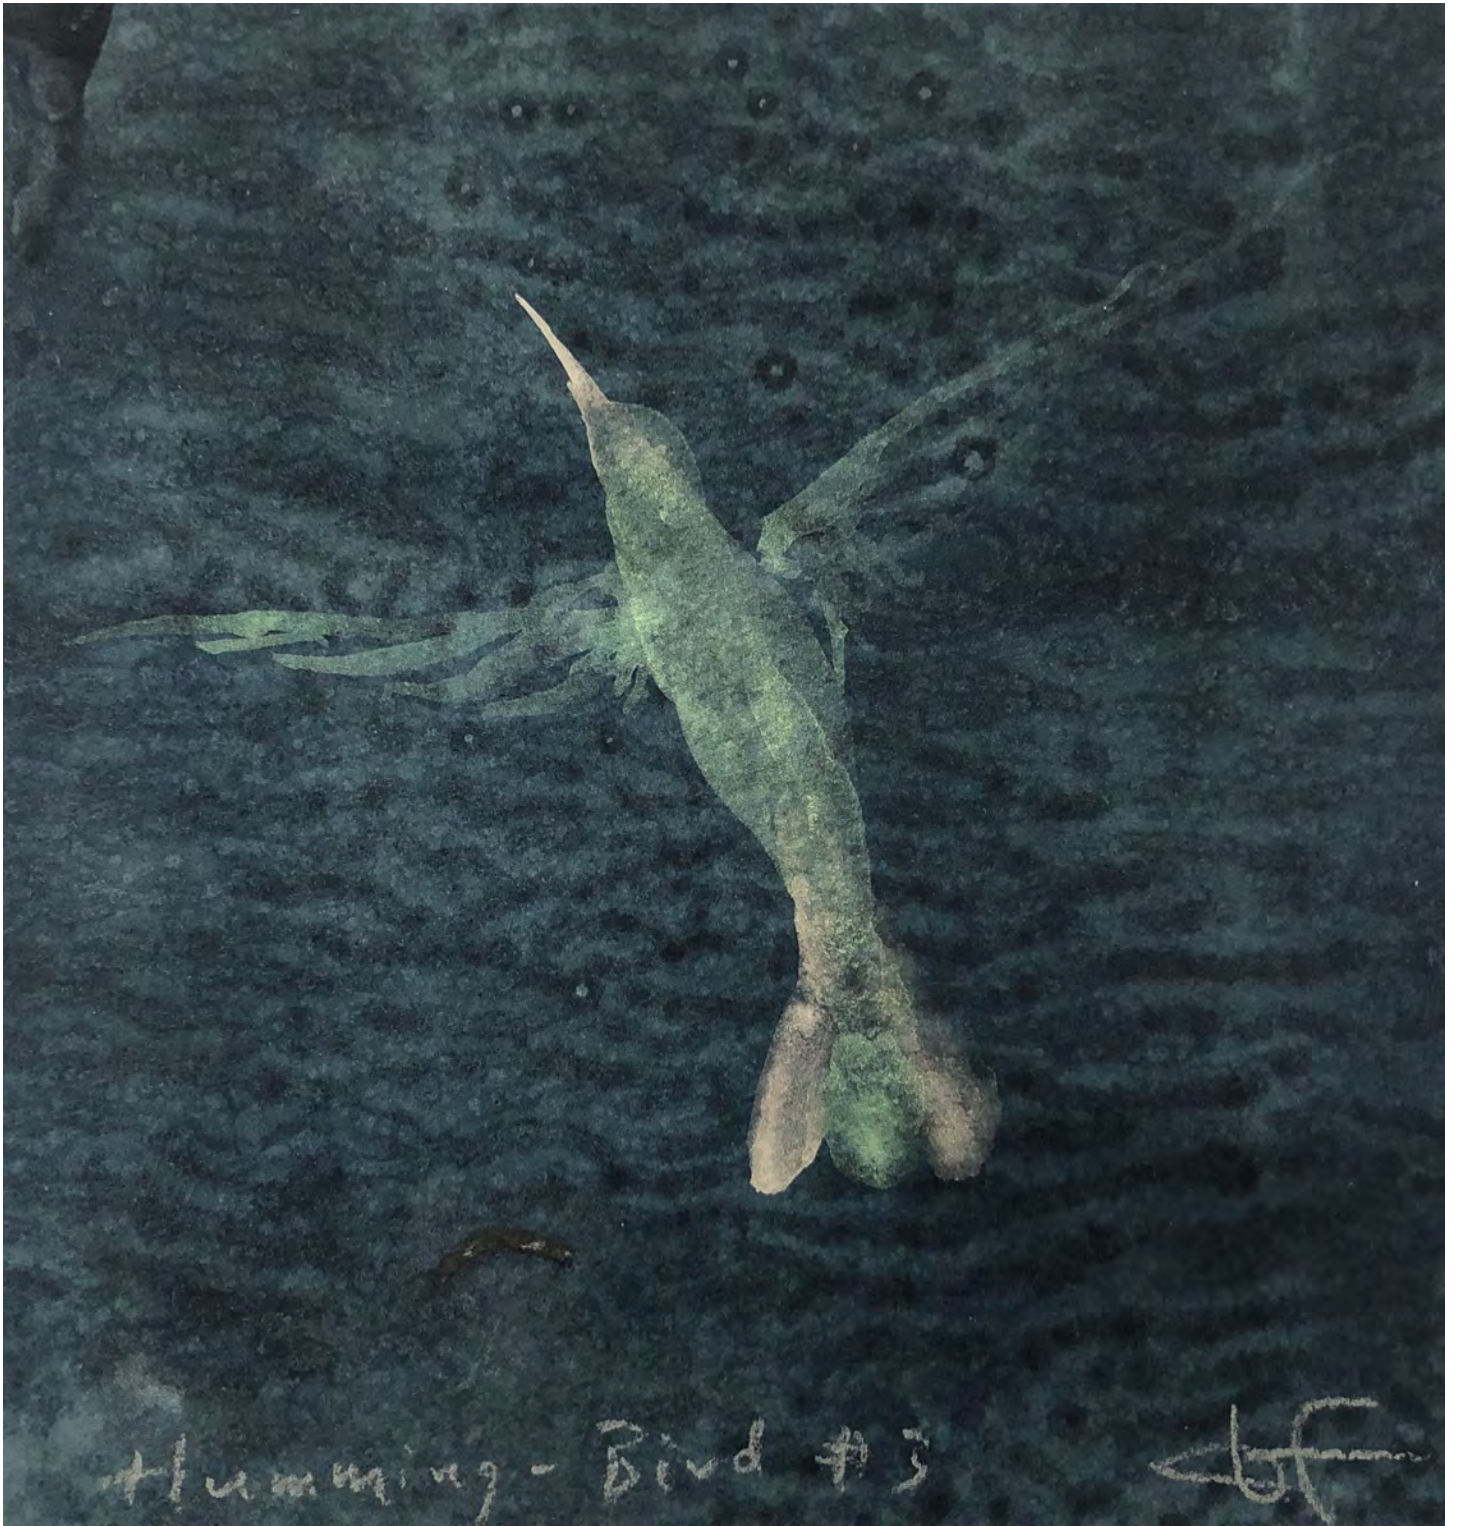

There is a patch of untended ground in front of the studio, and I suggested that she use the ground as a way to develop her thesis. Within months, the "wasteland" of space turned into an oasis of growth and rejuvenation.

I once came into the studio, and I noticed that now hummingbirds, who used to just come and go after feeding on the nectar I provided, now would stay, with several of them dashing about in and out of the new garden. When I told Mercy this, she said, "did you know that hummingbirds can see colors that we can't? The reason they are staying in the garden is because the plants are exuding colors."

What colors do we not see? How do we capture that mystery of creation? How does touching the soil result in us "knowing" the earth, and ourselves better?

These are questions I ponder as I paint "Mercy's Garden" series.
