Amanda Sperber

Amanda Sperber is an American freelance foreign correspondent based between Nairobi, Kenya and Mogadishu, Somalia. She generally covers conflict, politics and humanitarian emergencies.

Amanda writes for Al Jazeera English, Foreign Policy, Glamour, the Guardian, IRIN News, Marie Claire, News Deeply, Quartz, Reuters, VICE and related outlets. She strings for AFP and the Times of London, and voices dispatches for RTE: Irish National Radio. She’s appeared on national and international networks including Blogs of War, NPR. Women’s Media Live and Women Under Siege.

She's snuck into both the Nuba Mountains and Blue Nile, rebel-held territories of Sudan to write and produce features that have been shortlisted for awards including the Amnesty International Multimedia Award. She took an old German warship down from Tanzania to Zambia for VICE Magazine and and covered security in Timbuktu, northern Mali.

Amanda’s reporting is referenced in ACLU research papers, American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, the Atlantic, Congressional Research Service, Council on Foreign Relations, Freedom House, OHCHR, Relief Web, Strategic Thinking, Tony Blair Faith Foundation and Wikipedia.

A graduate of New York University in 2009 and the London School of Economics in 2010, Amanda is a contributor to the Fuller Project and a 2012 StartingBloc Fellow.
