JOURNAL OF ALLIED HEALTH

Given the broad range of interests represented by the term allied health, it often is challenging to match articles submitted to the Association’s Journal of Allied Health with reviewers who are well-versed in specific topical areas. A related matter is a desire to avoid calling upon the same group of current reviewers too often. Although the panel consists of 209 reviewers, there rarely ever seems to be enough of them at any given time. Thus, newcomers always are welcome to join the ranks.

Ideally, they should possess a doctorate degree and have experience both as authors and reviewers for other journals. Deans and directors at ASAHP member institutions are requested to bring this invitation to the attention of their faculty.

Reviewers are sought in the following areas: Athletic Training, Audiology, Speech-Language Pathology, Clinical/Medical Laboratory Science, Curriculum Development, Dental Hygiene, Dietetics/Nutrition, Genomics, Geriatrics, Health Promotion, Health Workforce, Interprofessional Education, Occupational Therapy, Physical Therapy, Qualitative Research, Radiation Therapy, Radiologic Science, Respiratory Therapy, Statistics, and Research Methodology. Please send responses to thomas@asahp.org.

FUNDING OPPORTUNITIES

PCORI seeks to fund projects that address critical knowledge gaps in the communication and dissemination of research results to patients, their caregivers, and clinicians, and the communication among these groups to make the best possible decisions in choosing among care and treatment options. Academic institutions are eligible to apply. The deadline for submitting a Letter of Intent is March 2, 2016. Information can be accessed at: http://www.pcori.org/sites/default/files/PCORI-PFA-2016-Cycle-I-Communication-and-Dissemination-Research.pdf.

Other funding opportunities that may be of interest are directed toward: Improving Methods for Conducting Patient-Centered Outcomes Research, Addressing Disparities, and Assessment of Prevention, Diagnosis, and Treatment Options. More information can be accessed at http://www.pcori.org/content/cycle-1-2016-funding-announcements?utm_source=020916+Monthly+Newsletter&utm_campaign=020916+Monthly+Newsletter&utm_medium=email.

REFORMING STUDENT AID

According to a report from the Urban Institute, based on a review of proposals for improving the complex array of federal student aid programs, there exists agreement on some broad policy directions, but considerable differences of opinion about the details. Many advocates support automatically placing student borrowers into income-driven repayment plans, which set payments at some percentage of discretionary income.

Essentially no one argues against consolidating tuition tax credits and deductions into a single credit. The report examines over 20 proposals for reforming student loan repayment and education tax credits and deductions, evaluating the equity and efficiency of proposed provisions and providing recommendations for strengthening these components of federal student aid.

CAM

According to information provided by the RAND Corporation, complementary and alternative medicine professionals are treated differently by insurance payers. Moreover, integrating them into primary care rarely is considered in health policy or research. It is believed that limiting their scope of practice has significant policy implications for patients, the CAM professions, and health care in general.

A Research Brief entitled Advancing Complementary and Alternative Medicine Professions examines the landscape for four types of CAM practitioners with the strongest claim on established professional status: chiropractic; acupuncture and Oriental medicine; naturopathic medicine; and massage therapy. The study examines various policies that apply to CAM, the research literature, and the results from two panel discussions — one of CAM experts and the other of health care decision-makers.
