Larissa Tang is a medical student at The University of Hong Kong, currently undertaking the intercalated Master of Research in Medicine programme at the Department of Ophthalmology.

During her university studies, she was involved in several health advocacy projects both in HK and abroad, including developing a global health toolkit with international medical students. She had most recently spent six months volunteering at The United Nations Population Fund in Cambodia to work on sexual reproductive health and gender advocacy as well as youth engagement. She treasures every opportunity to connect her studies in medicine with her interest in international development.