HEALTH AND ILLNESS IN THE ARTS

Highlights of the MET Museum collection.

The museum visit is akin to walking rounds at the hospital—rounds that enable us not just to see the triumph of artistry over the mundane and the monotonous, but to sharpen our observational skills. The visit aims to initiate tiny ripples in the reflecting pool of the observer’s mind. Observing art is a sublime exercise in truly looking and feeling—one that can help us become better health care providers.

This activity is organized by the Nursing Humanities: Developing a Sense of Salience project. A grant funded by the Curricular Development Challenge Fund of New York University.
