The Light Between Us

What is the exchange this art, so wrapped up in its own processes of discovery and transformation, wishes to make? Benjamin knows himself to be a seeker: he says as much, repeatedly: he surrenders himself to the process of making images, he takes himself back, he concentrates his forces, he lets himself go. Here he is discussing the sequence of works in this exhibition, and his surrender to the act of unconscious painting, of painting as meditation. "All have been worked, edited, abandoned, re-imagined quite extensively." This seems an exceptionally revealing guide to these paintings. They are much more than mere landscapes, just as the accompanying suite of still lifes are more than dead nature captured in paint.

They bear the impress of an artist caught in a struggle, and using his artistry to achieve victories of the spirit. The paintings may have the deceptive air of mere bush studies, but they are best conceived as mirrors, in which Benjamin discloses his reflected self - all he contends against and all he wishes for, the bleak, blasted, harsh contours of the inland irradiated by the grace and loveliness of the inland's light, that light, at once sober and dispassionate, that travellers in both geographical and psychological wildernesses know very well, for it is the clue to the hidden answers we dream of to every question in the world.
