LIMESTONE RIDGE PRESERVE
TRAIL MAP

Limestone Ridge, a 97-acre preserve, is a forested tract of land immediately south of the Paulins Kill. The preserve hosts various deciduous and evergreen species, dominated on the north by hemlocks. Large tulip poplars, successional black birch, and mature oak, hickory and maple trees are present. A perennial stream flows within a deep ravine on the eastern end of the property.

The topography throughout is the characteristic “pinnacle and trough” terrain found in areas underlain by limestone within the Kittatinny Valley, wherein resistant strata of limestone stand out in bold relief while less resistant beds weather into narrow trough-like alleys. The western edge of the preserve is bounded by a steep escarpment that exposes the carbonate bedrock. Another steep escarpment is found on the northern side facing the Paulins Kill. A third escarpment bounds the stream valley in the eastern part of the preserve. Wetlands make up a minor part of the preserve and are found principally along the northwestern edge along Hope Road.
