It is time to release the Simmonson family's statement about the death of their son, Michael. The family has been through a lot and now they are ready to move on. The statement reads: "We are ready to move on and let Michael rest in peace. We apologize to all who have been affected by this tragedy."
Simionson

Simionson received notice of his suspension from the University of Oregon in February 2009 due to allegations of academic dishonesty. The university's decision was based on an investigation that found Simionson had engaged in plagiarism. He was given the option to appeal the decision through the university's grievance process.

Simionson's case was the latest in a string of academic misconduct cases at the university, which has faced criticism for its handling of such incidents. The university's policy on academic dishonesty is strict, and violations can result in significant consequences for students, including suspension or expulsion.

Simionson's suspension was met with mixed reactions from the university community. Some faculty members supported the decision, citing the importance of maintaining academic integrity, while others criticized the process and the university's handling of the case.

Simionson's case raised questions about the university's ability to enforce its policies effectively and fairly. It also highlighted the challenges faced by universities in dealing with academic misconduct, particularly in the digital age where plagiarism is easier to commit and detect.
