As the world focuses on Syria, settlers continue to colonize Palestinian land. Violence against Palestinians is perpetrated as a form of ethnic cleansing while the U.S., Israel’s biggest supporter, turns a blind eye.

In an article published in the June/July 2013 issue of the Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, news editor Delinda Hanley states that “Israeli society as a whole is becoming more racist,” and that “it should come as no surprise that a settler state based on the rule of one ethnic group would be steeped in racist, religiously exclusive public policies.” Hanley’s cogent words summarize the national context for the phenomenon of Israeli settler violence against Palestinians in the occupied West Bank since late 2011. The international context is provided by international law, specifically the Fourth Geneva Convention; the establishment of any and all Israeli settlements (a euphemism for “colonies”) in the West Bank violates Article 49 that forbids an occupying power from moving its own population onto the land it occupies.

The inevitable result is described in a fact sheet issued by the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) in November 2011: “The root cause of the settler violence phenomenon is Israel’s decades-long policy of illegally facilitating the settling of its citizens inside occupied Palestinian territory.”

Tragically, the trend is toward greater settler violence. Yousef Munayyer of the Palestine Center reported that there had been a “noticeable increase in settler violence” since 2006. The Palestine Center published a paper on Israeli settler violence on February 14, 2012, entitled “When Settlers Attack,” which calculates more than 3,700 violent incidents between 2004 and 2011. Incidents are said to occur on an almost daily basis. According to the UN OCHA, “the number of settler attacks resulting in Palestinian casualties and property damage increased . . . by over 144 percent” from 2009 to 2011. Among violent actions by settlers, it lists “physical assaults, harassment, takeover of and damage to private property, blocking of access to grazing and agricultural land,” as well as injuring animals and land. Settlers poison wells, send their waste down onto lower-lying Palestinian villages, uproot olive trees, burn fields and structures, and stone children. OCHA warns that “nearly 250,000 Palestinians” located in “80 communities [are] vulnerable to settler violence”; 76,000 of these “are at high risk.”

As part of their strategy, settlers who practice violence toward Palestinians have adopted what they call a “price tag” policy. As explained by the Israeli human rights organization B’Tselem, this policy (implemented “in recent years”) uses the “price tag” label to justify settler aggression by presenting such aggression as retaliation for “actions by Israeli authorities that are perceived [to harm] the settlement enterprise.” In other words, any Israeli government action construed as opposing settlements will exact a price by producing more settler violence. Settler attacks may even

In October 2012, the WAMM newsletter published an article by Lori Wallach of Public Citizen’s Global Trade Watch about a secret trade agreement that, if passed, would have a tremendous impact on the U.S. and other countries and “reach directly into the lives of individuals.” The administration is hoping to have it concluded by the end of this year so I think it’s time to raise awareness again. But the agreement is so secretive that Congress is still not even allowed negotiation observer status, which, according to Global Trade Watch, “is astounding given that the U.S. Constitution provides Congress [with] exclusive authority over trade policy.”

Parts of the agreement, have, none the less, been leaked. Even so the corporate media apparently has little interest in probing the implications of the agreement.

However, progressive populist Jim Hightower has been paying attention. A recent issue of his newsletter, Hightower Lowdown, contains a 4-page article about The Trans-Pacific Partnership (TTP), proposed by President Obama’s trade officials. There is plenty of reason to believe that readers of the WAMM newsletter will oppose the TPP from what he describes. Hightower said we need to spread the word and I’ve taken the liberty of recapping his recap. So here it is.

The TPP could be compared to NAFTA. Remember NAFTA? It was going to make us all more prosperous. However, thousands of factories closed, thousands of jobs went overseas, Mexican farmers lost out big time and hundreds of towns and cities, including Detroit went down the tube. The following are some of the more salient issues about the newer Transpacific Partnership:

Food Safety. Any regulations more stringent than “international standards” could be ruled as “illegal trade barriers” and U.S. standards could be weakened.

Fracking. The U.S. Dept. of Energy would lose its authority to regulate exports of natural gas to any TPP nation. Unregulated natural gas with its damaging fracking process could be exported to member nations without environmental and economic impact review.

Jobs. U.S. corporations could move jobs from the U.S. to low-wage nations.

Drug Prices. The big pharmaceutical companies would be given more years of monopoly pricing on their patents and would be able to block distribution of cheaper generic drugs.

Banksters. TPP would prohibit transaction taxes (such as the proposed Robin Hood tax) and would restrict “firewall” reforms that separate consumer banking from risky investment banking; this would roll back reforms adopted to fix extreme bank-deregulation that caused Wall Street’s 2007 crash and it would provide an escape from national rules limiting the size of “too-big-to-fall” behemoths.

Internet Freedom. Corporate-created content would be given copyright protection for 120 years! It would also provide a police force to monitor “user activity” and conceivably cut off access. Consumers could be assessed mandatory fines for non-commercial, small-scale copying.

A Corporatocracy. There is no expiration date on the agreement and no provision enabling modification.

Investor-State Dispute Resolution. In such a court corporations would be able to sue TPP governments over environmental, health, consumer, zoning, or any other public policies that corporations claim are undermining their TPP rights or their “expected future profits.” Cases would be decided behind closed doors by three-person international tribunals of private attorneys who most often would have a strong corporate bias. They would not be accountable to any electorate and their decisions are final and without appeal.

Icing On the Cake. Even before TPP is imposed, corporations are demanding $14 billion for cases brought under free trade agreement. Among those suing governments in investor-state tribunals are:

- Philip Morris attacking Australia’s and Uruguay’s cigarette labeling policies
- Chevron, for gross toxic contamination in the Ecuadorian Amazon
- Eli Lilly, demanding Canada’s patent laws provide its drugs monopoly protection
- several European investments firms, assaulting Egypt’s minimum wage laws

Why Has the U.S. public been kept in the dark about TPP? Because the corporate and political powers have hoped to keep the issue private. TPP negotiations began in 2008 by the second George Bush. Obama’s top trade representative, Rob Kirk, stated that secrecy was necessary because the deal’s details would “outrage Americans and spook Congress

Dear Mr. Kerry:

Just heard you saying that “we cannot be spectators to slaughter.” Indeed very ironic that the U.S. was a spectator when white phosphorus was used by Israel against the Palestinians in Gaza during Operation Cast Lead at the end of December 2008. Furthermore, the U.S. used white phosphorus during its invasion of Iraq.

“When your house is of glass you do not throw stones at other people’s homes.”

I should think that you out of all people who were so keen to get the Palestinian-Israeli negotiations started so that peace will eventually prevail in the region, will try to deter an attack on Syria and not enflame it. Have not the Syrian people suffered enough without a further strike when you cannot even guarantee where and how it will end? Have you not had enough losses of your young people in Iraq, Afghanistan?

We urge you to forget about your ego as a world police, and step down with dignity. Britain your great ally could be your model since it has clearly broken the leash of being your poodle.

Wise people and smart politicians learn from their mistakes, so we hope wisdom will prevail so as to avoid another human catastrophe.

Stop This Fracking Business

Enbridge, the Canadian oil corporation, has a 285-mile tar sands pipeline across northern Minnesota crossing the Mississippi headwaters, and also crossing water flowing north to Hudson Bay and east out the Great Lakes/St. Lawrence Seaway. Enbridge requested an increase of 27 percent to 570,000 barrels per day in a pipeline. Most goes for export. Call Washington.
Looking the Other Way
And while we’re on the subject of war, what happened to those magnificent Palestinian-Israeli negotiations that John Kerry was boasting about? While we express our anguish at the hideous gassings in Syria, the land of Palestine continues to be gobbled up. Israel’s Likudist policy – to negotiate for peace until there is no Palestine left – continues apace . . .

Being Wiped Off the Map?
The West Bank city of Hebron was known in its heyday as a vibrant hub of Palestinian commerce and trade. Today, however, the city’s name invokes images of apartheid, structural violence, and stark poverty. Our visit to Hebron was widely described among ICAHD campers as the most disturbing portion of our trip; the daily realities of life in the city are often beyond belief.

Building Hope
The Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions launched its tenth annual Rebuilding Camp on Sunday, July 1st. More than 30 volunteers from around the world joined Palestinians and Israelis in the West Bank town of Anata to rebuild a Palestinian home demolished five times by Israel.

Shifting Power
Before we talk about democracy in Syria, we must respect the fact that the vast majority of people on earth insist that Western governments respect their own citizens’ will instead of trying to smother them or shape them with propaganda or bypass them to serve the Israeli lobby. Before we talk about democracy in Syria, we must end apartheid in Israel . . . liberate oppressors and oppressed alike and create a better world for all.

target Israeli security forces, in addition to targeting Palestinians.

However, the Israeli authorities have been accused by the Israeli civil organization Yesh Din, Volunteers for Human Rights, which published a report on July 24, 2013, of enabling “Jewish terrorism” on the West Bank by not prosecuting it. Less than 10 percent of cases known to Yesh Din, which fall under the jurisdiction of the Israeli Judea and Samaria/ West Bank District Police, lead to indictments. But Yesh Din holds the Israeli military (IDF), rather than the police, ultimately responsible for failing “to defend the Palestinian population from Jewish marauders.” They emphasize that such protection by the IDF of the occupied population is obligatory not only under international law but also as a result of Israeli High Court of Justice decisions.

If the lawless behavior of Israeli settlers toward Palestinians is understood as a component of the Israeli government’s actual long-term ethnic cleansing program vis-à-vis the Palestinians, this helps to account for the overall complicity by Israeli authorities (both police and army) with Israeli settler violence.

While recognition of the government-military endorsement of settler violence is essential, to me the heart of the matter is the physical and psychological impact on West Bank Palestinians of this warrior behavior from their more fanatical, outlaw settler neighbors, whose campaign to remove them from their land is motivated by extremist, racist, and exclusivist ideology. These Palestinians have already endured more than 46 years of oppressive, illegal Israeli military occupation. Accounts by two Palestinian women of their personal experience of settler violence published in the Spring 2013 issue of Cornerstone, a Sabeel publication, leave a deep impression.

The first account is by Fatima, age 38, who drove with her husband and three children on a Saturday in late February 2013 to plant almond trees and tend their land outside of Qusra, the village where they live not far from the city of Nablus north of Ramallah. After working all morning they were drinking tea in the shed on their land when five Israeli settlers from the settlement of Esh Kodesh appeared with guns, shouting and swearing. Fatima and her husband left the shed to try to deal with the intrusion, but before they could return to their children, Fatima reported that one of the settlers positioned “about 50 meters away . . . started shooting in our direction.” She writes,“I was terrified and thought I was going to be killed on the spot.” No Israeli soldiers were anywhere to be seen. Fatima and her husband managed to reach their car, which was parked a few meters away, without being shot. However, the settlers threw stones at close range as they drove away. Their children “miraculously . . . escaped” from the shed on their own, and there were no physical injuries; yet Fatima has clearly suffered from PTSD. It was later discovered that the settlers had uprooted trees and damaged the shed. This was not an isolated incident; indeed she says “it happens all the time.”

The second account, by Khadra, age 43, is of an incident in which a Palestinian youth was shot in the head by a settler from the hilltop settlement of Yitzhar at the village of Asira Al-Qibliyeh, also in the Nablus area. This incident likewise took place on a Saturday, May 19, 2012, which happens to be the Jewish Sabbath. Attacks by “radical settlers” from Yitzhar on the villagers are frequent, according to Khadra. This time a group of armed settlers walked toward the village, unarmed village men walked out to stop the settlers, stones were thrown back and forth, and then several settlers began shooting with their weapons. This “very tense,” unequal confrontation lasted for two hours. When they finally appeared, the Israeli soldiers “did almost nothing. Then [the soldiers] shot tear gas and everybody started to clear the area.” Khadra concludes: “I could not sleep that night. It is a disturbing feeling to know we are completely on our own; nobody is there to help or protect us.”

Perhaps the most concentrated and shocking example of settler violence toward Palestinians under occupation is the situation in the Palestinian city of Hebron on the West Bank south of Bethlehem. In the 1990s, after the Oslo agreement of 1993, Israel divided Hebron into two parts: H1 under the Palestinian Authority, and H2 under the Israeli Defense Force.

—Mazin Qumsiyeh, Human Rights newsletter

(LDF). In addition to “approximately 30,000 Palestinians,” H2 houses from 400 to 800 Israeli settlers, guarded by about 1,500 Israeli soldiers. The settlers aggress against their Palestinian neighbors by harassing children on their way to or from school, throwing objects such as rocks, breaking into homes, writing graffiti on house walls (“kill all Arabs,” “gas the Arabs,” “exterminate the Muslims,” etc.), and more: In one incident “settlers brought dogs to attack children playing in a field,” and in another “a settler attempted to run over” a boy of 15 “with a minibus.” Instead of stopping these horrific attacks and arresting the perpetrators, the IDF soldiers impose curfews on the Palestinians and otherwise restrict their movement, arrest and detain Palestinian youth—even children—and unleash violence themselves, with such weapons as M4 rifles and grenades. Journalist Sarah Lazare writes that Hebron “has become ground zero for an ethnic cleansing campaign waged by settlers with the complicity of the Israeli army.”

From a safe distance, settler violence could be considered “the icing on the cake” of the deeply entrenched structural violence represented by Israel’s colonial settlements. The settlements are now home to at least 600,000 Israelis, the majority of them enticed by government subsidies. As Israeli-Palestinian “peace talks” resumed in the middle of August, Israel announced the phased release of 104 Palestinian prisoners (from a total of around 4,500 prisoners), but at the same time allowed the addition of approximately 2,000 new housing units to seven Jewish-only settlements: three of them in illegally annexed East Jerusalem, and four in the occupied West Bank. Needless to say, colonies and peace do not go well together. The Palestinian position preceding the talks had been that no negotiations could proceed if Israeli settlement expansion continued. Given the extreme power differential between the two parties and the U.S. government’s unqualified support for the stronger party, the Israeli government knew that it could impose its will with impunity regardless of Palestinian wishes.

One recommended step for readers to take is to tell Congress and Secretary of State John Kerry by letter, e-mail, and phone that Americans firmly oppose Israeli settlement construction, settler violence, and ethnic cleansing, and that the U.S. government must stop its billions of dollars of aid paid annually to Israel if these egregious actions—which completely contradict a just peace—continue.

And on July 14, 2013, the website of ICAHD (the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions) reported on continuing settler persecution of the Jaber family in the Hebron area since at least 2000: “In short, settler violence is NEVER investigated and settlers are NEVER arrested, even if the police are on the scene of the crime. The goal: to terrorize the Palestinians to leave their land, which would then be grabbed up by settlers in the name of the state of Israel. If anyone tries to tell you that Israel does not engage in ethnic cleansing or that what it does is for reasons of ‘security,’ take them to the Jaber family.”

Here are some observations from the Global Network’s 21st annual space conference held June 27-29, 2013 in Kiruna, Sweden.

The event was attended by people from Sweden, Norway, Finland, Denmark, Germany, England, Russia, US, Mexico and Japan.

Kiruna is a city of about 20,000 people in the High North and has the largest underground iron ore mine in the world. During WW II the Nazi’s never occupied Sweden but instead took the iron ore from Kiruna to Germany to build their war machine.

Just outside of Kiruna is the Esrange Space Center where images are downloaded from satellites in polar orbits. The information from the satellites is used for both civilian and military purposes.

Norwegian journalist Bard Wormdal, who wrote The Satellite War, reported that Norway practices a “double standard” as it violates the Svalbard and Antarctic Treaties, which forbid military operations of any kind from these north and south polar locations. In both cases Norway has downlink satellite stations at these two points and provide the U.S. and NATO with imagery that is used for military operations. The Norwegian government still denies this even after the publication of Wormdal’s book which provides conclusive evidence of these treaty violations.

Russian conference participant Vladimir Kozin told us that when Obama recently spoke in Berlin about the need for cuts in nuclear weapons the Pentagon at the very same moment was releasing a new plan to upgrade existing U.S. nuclear weapons based in Europe.

Kozin stated that the Russian government feels strongly that the U.S. “missile defense” program (now being expanded with NATO to surround Russia) undercuts Russian strategic defense capability and makes hopes for nuclear disarmament virtually impossible. In Obama’s Berlin speech he did not mention one word about missile defense, Kozin recalled.

The new European Union “Galileo” military/civilian satellite system (like the U.S. GPS) will be used to explore for oil and natural gas drilling in the melting Arctic Ocean.

Activists from Finland showed the conference a map of the large drone testing area that has been established in their country. The 11,000 square kilometer test area is only 30 kilometers from the Russian border. In 2005 drones that were used in Afghanistan were tested at the range. Finnish corporate controlled media, as in Sweden and Norway, are conducting major anti-Russian propaganda that is pumping up tension in the region.

Again and again during the conference links were made between climate change and expanding militarism. There was agreement that we should all be demanding the conversion of the military industrial complex so that our resources can be used to deal with climate change.

In Darmstadt, Germany U.S. military downlink radars were removed some years ago but it was only recently learned that, at that same location, there still exists a military war fighting computer center.

Following the recent disclosures about the NSA by the whistleblower Edward Snowden, the UK government told their media that they are not allowed to mention the NSA surveillance program and the Menwith Hill (U.S. NSA spy base) in Yorkshire in the same story.

Particular thanks go to Women for Peace and especially those in Kiruna who worked so hard to make it a great conference.

Dirty Wars: the Book

“We have killed an amazing number of people . . . none has proven to have been a real threat.”
—General Stanley McChrystal

The killing of vast numbers of civilian noncombatants is just one of the regrettable developments of the Global War on Terror conducted by the U.S. government in response to the 9-11 attacks. The new book Dirty Wars: The World Is a Battlefield by national-security correspondent Jeremy Scahill of The Nation magazine gives the most incisive account yet of what has resulted from a worldwide conflict that is far from over.

The goal of reorganizing the Middle East—beginning with the removal of Saddam Hussein—was concocted by Dick Cheney, Don Rumsfeld, and their neocon cohorts years before the 9-11 attacks, which provided a rationale for the U.S. to invade Afghanistan and then Iraq. The failure of conventional forces to fulfill their mission of pacifying Iraq led to reliance on the Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC), elite units of Army Rangers, Navy SEALs, and Delta Force warriors, who operated outside the normal command structure, and answered only to Rumsfeld and his inner circle in the executive branch without oversight by the State Department or Congress.

When Iraq descended into chaos and civil war in 2005-2006, JSOC units became the tip of the spear as their missions eliminated thousands of insurgents. Public perception is that an eventual stalemate had been drawn out of a loss in Iraq, for which General David Petraeus and his counterinsurgency strategy have been given most of the credit. Scahill fills in the picture by his accounts of the secretive raids organized by McChrystal and Admiral William McRaven.

However, the world had now been turned into a battlefield; al Qaeda set up bases in Pakistan, Yemen, and Somalia. “Draining the swamp” now required additional JSOC missions in these and several other countries. Scahill provides a wealth of information on operations in Yemen and Somalia, including the failed proxy war by an invasion from Ethiopia in 2006, which resulted in the rise of al Shahab, an al Qaeda affiliate.

An additional weapon was brought to the war on terror by the use of weaponized drones. When Barack Obama became president in 2008, he repudiated the Iraq War but escalated troop levels in Afghanistan, even though most al Qaeda operatives had left the country. Drone attacks into Pakistan steadily increased as the Obama administration built the infrastructure for a U.S. assassination program.

The ultimate assassination came on May 2, 2011, when a team of elite Navy SEALs secretly choppered into the compound of Osama bin Laden in Abbottabad, Pakistan, and killed him. Scahill’s account of this famous raid is riveting and also clarifies some details that have been misreported.

As a narrative thread, every few chapters Scahill describes how Anwar al-Awlaki, an American citizen who was radicalized by 9-11 and subsequent U.S. attacks on Muslims, became a target for assassination by drone, especially after he went to Yemen and preached jihad against America. Awlaki’s father, Nasser, who had come to the U.S. on a Fulbright scholarship in 1966 to study agricultural economics at New Mexico State University, wrote a personal letter to Obama protesting the targeting of his son, citing protections of the U.S. Constitution. But Obama and JSOC were determined to get Awlaki. After several misses, a drone killed Awlaki and two others on September 30, 2011. Two weeks later, Awlaki’s 16-year-old son, Abdulrahman, was killed by a drone along with several members of his family at a picnic, even though the boy was also a U.S. citizen and wasn’t involved in terrorist activity. These killings, along with hundreds of civilian fatalities from drone strikes in Pakistan, have caused a storm of protest around the world, but the administration held fast to its position that the world is the battlefield.

It employed what it referred to as “signature strikes.” Any male age 18 and older who was in a place deemed a battlefield area and was exhibiting certain kinds of behavior was considered a terrorist and an imminent threat to the U.S. unless proven innocent; there was no opportunity to prove innocence to a drone operator calling a strike from thousands of miles away, so that would mean the only opportunity to prove innocence would be after the targeted person was dead.

Now a whole slew of suspected terrorists have been eliminated by JSOC operations. Drones and JSOC teams, under the direction of McRaven, are operating in more than a hundred countries around the world. But are we winning and are we any safer? Scahill points out that the potential for blowback from all the civilian casualties is enormous and asks the question, “How does a war like this ever end?”

Islam: Common Myths Deconstructed
by Polly Mann

The excellent 200-page book, Islamophobia and the Politics of Empire by Deepa Kumar (Haymarket Books 2012) could be described as a succinct primer for those of us who have given little thought as to why there is such mistrust of Middle Easterners among Americans. This fear was exacerbated by the Twin Trade Towers bombing of 9/11 and subsequently, the word “terrorist” became connected with Middle Easterners in the minds of many Americans. This book brings together past history and current events as it examines the prevalent myths about Islam that have produced such fear in this country. A summary of the myths and the reality follow:

Islam is a monolithic belief. A common misperception is that all Middle Easterners are Arabs and all Arabs are adherents of Islam; people also think there are no variations in the way the religion is practiced. Kumar makes a comparison of Christianity with Islam. As there are Baptists, Methodists, Seventh Day Adventists and scores of groups professing Christianity and Orthodox and Fundamentalist Jews so there are different varieties of Islam of which there are two main categorie: Sunni and Shi’a. The Sufi Islam practiced in India is quite different from the Shi’a Islam practiced in Pakistan. They could be compared to Catholic and Protestant Christians.

Islam is a sexist religion. As the British in the 1800s denounced sexism in Islam, they worked to deny British women the right to vote. Discussion of the rights of women continue in Islamic society as in Christian and Judaic society. Some scholars argue that Islam is not inherently misogynistic and point to the egalitarian passages in the Koran that suggest equality between men and women. Equality for women is a tenet of most religions today— the fact that equality has not yet been fully achieved is a condition of all.

The “Muslim Mind” is incapable of reason and rationality. There are many excellent books and articles, listed in Kumar’s footnotes, that tear to shreds the concept of biologically defined races and the spurious connection between biology and intellectual capacity. The European Renaissance could not have occurred without the contributions of Muslim thinkers and scientists.

Islam is an inherently violent religion. This virulent myth is strong today, helped, of course, by 9/11. Author Amitabh Pal, Managing Editor of The Progressive magazine explored this myth in his book, “Islam” Means Peace: Understanding the Muslim Principle of Non-violence Today with examples of non-violence from the Koran. The bloody history of early Christianity with attention given to the Crusades is cited as a correlative of Islamic violence. The reader is reminded that after the Sultan Saladin retook Jerusalem from the Crusaders, he forbade acts of violence against them.

Muslims are incapable of democracy and self-rule. This is the false basis for much of Western policy with regard to the Middle East. Again and again Western nations have interfered in the internal affairs of Middle Eastern nations looking to avail themselves of their natural resources, such as oil and minerals, while claiming to be “bringing democracy.”

Today the worldwide Occupy movement is reminding people about the humanity we all share and how the greedy capitalist system is, in its essence, violent and how we can work together to bring about a peaceful world. When we are aware of the things that divide us such as Islamophobia we are more capable of making that dream a reality.

WOMEN, WAR AND DRONES:
AN AFGHAN WOMAN SPEAKS OUT

Twelve years into the U.S. war.
An evening with “the bravest woman in Afghanistan.”

Tuesday, October 15 • 7:00 p.m.
Augsburg College • Foss Center, 625 22nd Avenue South, Minneapolis

Malalai Joya has been called “the bravest Women in Afghanistan.” At the age of 25 as a member of the Afghan Parliament, she stood up and denounced her country’s powerful U.S./NATO backed warlords at a constitutional assembly in Kabul. Today she continues to be a staunch defender of human rights, a powerful voice for Afghan women, and an outspoken opponent of the U.S. war and occupation of her country. She is the recipient of numerous international awards for her work.
