A positive view of Muslims would hinder the multibillion dollar Islamophobia industry that promotes fear as part of the U.S. “War on Terror.”

The Business of Islamophobia: by Margaret Sarfehjooy

Part I: The Attack on CAIR-MN

With offices in the U.S. and Canada, the Council of American Islamic Relations (CAIR) has worked to promote a positive image of Islam and Muslims in America since its establishment in 1994. It is America’s largest Muslim civil rights and advocacy group. Because Minnesota is home to the largest Somali diaspora in the U.S., much of it in Minneapolis/St. Paul, the state’s CAIR office is often involved with advocacy for people of Somali origin—hearing complaints, advising them of their rights, and helping to resolve issues of harassment, discrimination, and bias.

Somalis in the Twin Cities have complained of FBI harassment ranging from being stopped at random on streets, in shopping malls, and campus libraries; stalked at mosques; interviewed without translators or access to lawyers; and having their legitimate businesses raided and shut down, their employment threatened, and airline boarding passes denied without due process.

It was in the nature of these kinds of concerns that earlier this year, a distraught Somali man came to CAIR-MN for help, stating that two FBI agents threatened to withhold his asylum application and defame him in the Muslim community if he didn’t agree to be an informant for them. He said that despite his repeated requests for an attorney, the agents continued to try to coerce and intimidate him, and ultimately they caused him to lose his job after they had followed him conspicuously and photographed him at his job site. CAIR requested that a special agent with oversight investigate the actions of the agents for improper behavior.

On January 30, the CAIR-MN (Minnesota) office issued a press release announcing that it welcomed the FBI’s response to their request to investigate the threatening tactics alleged to have been used by the two agents.

However, just two days after the press release was issued, two FBI agents appeared unannounced at the home of Lori Saroya, the executive director of CAIR-MN, stating that they were conducting “community outreach.” Subsequently, CAIR-MN’s attorney called the agents and asked if they were assigned to “community outreach”; he admitted that they were not.

The American Civil Liberties Union commented: “Once again it appears FBI agents are improperly exploiting the goodwill established through community outreach programs as a method of gaining access to community members for investigative purposes. Trained FBI investigators know that showing up unannounced at someone’s home is intimidating, and they could have contacted Ms. Saroya by telephone or at her office to set up an appointment if the true purpose was a simple ‘meet and greet’ with a member of her household.”

The Wall Street Journal (online.wsj.com) picked up the story and reported that on February 13, 2013, in a letter to Attorney General Holder, CAIR National Legal Director Nadhira Al-Khalili wrote: “The FBI has a well-documented history of using community outreach methods as a means to coerce, threaten, and intimidate members of the Muslim community. Given the above facts, it is difficult for us to reach any conclusion other than that [the agent’s] visit was prompted by what the field office may have perceived as negative media attention. Further, we believe reasonable people can conclude the visit was an attempt to intimidate a highly regarded community leader.”

Lori Saroya has served in civic organizations including the Minnesota Alliance on Crime, the Minneapolis Department of Civil Rights Task Force, and the Minnesota Office of Justice Programs. For her work with CAIR-MN, Saroya received the St. Paul Foundation’s Facing Race Ambassador Award twice. She also received the 2011 Rising Star St. Catherine University Alumni Award in the areas of social justice and community advocacy. She was named one of the 2012 Ten Outstanding Young Minnesotans by the Minnesota Jaycees. In 2011, CAIR-MN was awarded the “2011 Mission & Excellence Anti-Racism Award” from the Minnesota Council of Nonprofits and MAP for Nonprofits.

But, while CAIR receives respect and accolades from many community leaders in Minnesota and nationwide, the organization has endured years of accusations and threats from those who make a living off the concept of Islamophobia. A positive view of Muslims hinders the multibillion dollar industry that profits from promoting fear of Muslims as part of the U.S. “War on Terror.”

Zaytuna College, located in Berkeley, California, is the first Muslim liberal arts college in America; Dr. Hatem Bazian, the co-founder, stated that “those who are working on Islamophobia believe that the more hatred we have of Muslims here, the more that we have reflexive hatred of Muslims abroad, thus authorizing or making the need for military action and the death and destruction of Muslims abroad more palatable to us without having to think we are actually killing humans.”

Part II: The Industry

The always-expanding surveillance industry receives billions of dollars from the Department of Homeland Security. The Washington Post discovered what amounts to an alternative geography of the United States, a “Top Secret America” hidden from public view and lacking in thorough oversight. Some 1,271 government organizations and 1,931 private companies work on programs related to counterterrorism, homeland security, and intelligence in about 10,000 locations across the United States.³

Private counterterrorism training firms capitalize on plentiful public grant funding. G.W. Schulz, an investigative journalist who tracks homeland security spending, notes that “agencies can apply for a dizzying array of federal grant programs, often without notifying local government officials about how grant funds are spent.”⁴

One training firm, Security Systems International, or SSI, uses alarmist rhetoric about Muslim organizations and also boasts that its “homeland security training in Israel” is the only privately operated trip of its kind that receives funding from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.⁵

David Gaubatz, who was SSI’s “star speaker” at the company’s 2010 convention, infiltrated the CAIR national office by sending in five researchers to work undercover for six months, three of them women who wore Muslim garb. Gaubatz directed his associates to act “Sharia compliant,” such as having the men grow beards, but not mustaches. Gaubatz also sent an individual pretending to be blind to attend the company’s 2010 convention, infiltrated as a Muslim-convert intern using the name “David Marshall,” and removed thousands of documents that provided the material for Gaubatz’s subsequent book against CAIR, Muslim Mafia.

This is the same David Gaubatz who claimed that he personally found sites with weapons of mass destruction within Iraq when he was an agent with the Air Force’s Office of Special Investigations in 2003,⁶ and who recently claimed on his counterterrorism radio program that many Muslims join the U.S. military to kill fellow soldiers.⁷ SSI’s founder, Henry Morgenstern, was a featured speaker at a 2006 Minnesota symposium on Terrorism and...
Recent legislation authorized women in the military to engage in armed combat. Many of us have been working for change in the opposite direction. Women Against Military Madness had its inception in 1981 when statistics showed that more women than men opposed war and we banded together to try to get our country to give up on war and seek other solutions for international disputes.

The number of females in combat zones is 150,000; 33 percent are African-American and 16.9 percent are Latina. I find it hard to believe that these groups are more pro-war—rather, I believe, they are more in need of jobs. Their unemployment ratios are high—14 percent for African-American women and 9.7 percent for Latina women (among the latter group who enlist, some may do so as a road to citizenship under the Dream Act). This is why, for many women, enlistment may seem like the only solution.

But Leah Bolger, a national leader in Veterans for Peace, does not see sending women into combat as a good solution. She recently commented: “If our government really wanted to support women, it could send 40 of them to college at $25,000 a year for the same price it costs to send one of them to fight in Afghanistan . . . The grotesque Pentagon budget should be slashed, and that money used for education, health care and jobs programs—that is the real answer for the advancement of women.”

One of the biggest drawbacks for women considering enlistment is the probability of sexual harassment and/or rape. In 2010 alone, the military experienced a staggering 19,000 sex crimes within its ranks. According to Department of Defense statistics, more than one-fifth of all active-duty female soldiers have been sexually assaulted, leaving women who have been raped in the military with a higher rate of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) than that of men in combat.

And the actual rate could be considerably higher. That’s because, to date, only 13.5 percent of all victims—both male and female—actually report incidents of sexual assault at the time they occur. Of the incidents that are reported, less than 10 percent are prosecuted. Today, the occurrence of sexual assault in the U.S. military is almost double that of American civilians.*

To make matters worse, only 15 Veteran Affairs centers in the United States provide residential mental-health treatment specifically for women with PTSD. A Military Times poll estimates the PTSD rates for female veterans of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars to be about 20 percent. (Various studies of PTSD prevalence among male veterans of those wars has estimated the rate at anywhere from 10 percent to 18 percent.)

Women considering enlistment would find it helpful to first see the documentary “The Invisible War,” which received the Sundance Film Festival Audience Award for Best Documentary (Director: Kirby Dick. Docurama Films. 2012). It is an investigation into the systematic and predatory nature of rape taking place in U.S. military compounds. Among its highly disturbing revelations are that rape is often committed by serial offenders.

But the possibility of falling victim to a sexual crime is not the only danger for women entering the military, aside from the obvious danger of being killed or wounded in combat. At the beginning of this year, it was widely reported in major media that in 2012, the number of active-duty U.S. army soldiers who committed suicide was 177, exceeding the 176 who were killed that year in Afghanistan. Across all branches of service 349 took their own lives, which was also more than died in combat. And, of former military personnel, an astonishing 6,500 killed themselves that year, roughly equivalent to one every 80 minutes.

I cannot imagine ever encouraging a young woman to enter the military, even in a non-combatant status, but if she so chooses, she should look into all the aspects of such a commitment.

*These figures are not limited to women. According to the Service Women’s Action Network, 46 percent of the roughly 108,000 veterans who experienced military sexual trauma (MST) in 2010 were men.

Remote Control Combat Stress
In the first study [Armed Forces Health Surveillance Center] of its kind, researchers with the Defense Department have found that pilots of drone aircraft experience mental health problems like depression, anxiety and post-traumatic stress at the same rate as pilots of manned aircraft who are deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan . . . The Air Force has also conducted research into the health issues of drone crew members. In a 2011 survey of nearly 840 drone operators, it found that 46 percent of Reaper and Predator pilots, and 48 percent of Global Hawk sensor operators, reported “high operational stress.”

Heavy Medal
The new blue, red and white-ribboned Distinguished Warfare Medal will be awarded to individuals for ‘extraordinary achievement’ related to a military operation that occurred after Sept. 11, 2001 [drone strikes and cyberware fare]. But unlike other combat medals, it does not require the recipient risk his or her life to get it.

The U.S. has now officially designated women as able to serve in combat. This is advancement?
Ten Years After Shock and Awe

Iraq has become an apartheid state. The division is between Iraq citizens and foreigners. Iraqis continue to have to pass through an exhausting number of checkpoints to get anywhere, but you don’t see U.S. soldiers manning them anymore. The checkpoints have an Iraqi face. The U.S. military is, however, pulling the strings. There are 16,000 U.S. military and employees in the Green Zone of Baghdad, where the U.S. embassy is.

Traffic is divided into two different traffic lanes—one for civilian Iraqis and the other for military and the foreigners. The foreigners move freely across Iraq in black SUVs with shaded windows without having to submit to delays or checks. But there are many, many stories of Iraqi drivers being stopped and remote control bombs going off in their traffic lanes.

There are not as many explosions as there once were, but there are still explosions. Only Iraqis are the victims. It is unknown who is being targeted or why. The explosions take place where Iraqis are waiting, such as in long lines at checkpoints. Baghdad is always crowded, so the checkpoints there are very dangerous.

Iraq’s new army is fully engaged to control thousands of checkpoints across the country but Iraqi’s national borders are not secured! Every Iraqi city has a Green Zone. Checkpoints exist to protect them. Most of the time women cannot get some places because they cannot undergo the “body checks”—there are no women police or soldiers to perform body checks on them.

Iraq is being prepared for division into three sections. That, I believe, is the plan and this is how it has been working. I can hear Iraqis when I travel around saying, “If the division of Iraq will save our lives, so be it.”

Iraq is governed under the same set of anti-terrorism “laws” that the U.S. passed with the Patriot Act. In accordance with this system, effective Sunni leaders have been driven from the Iraqi government. Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi should have been president but evidence of terrorism was fabricated against him. (Hashimi is now in exile in Turkey.) The Minister of Finance, Rafi’a Al Esawi, who is Sunni, was the next in line, but he also was accused of being a terrorist by secret evidence fabricated against him under the “Terrorism 4 Act.” Hashimi was tried in absentia and found guilty, just before a national reconciliation to stabilize Iraq was about to take place. Convictions on secret evidence were the straw that broke the camel’s back and the reason for the recent Sunni uprising, in which more than 100 people were killed in cities around Iraq.

Sunnis want Al-Maliki to step down so that they can take part in the government. This would be to the eventual advantage of Turkey. The first move will be taken by the Kurdish in the north. While Shia and Sunnis fight between themselves, Kurdish Iraq, will separate from them after controlling Kirkuk, the rich Iraqi city of oil. The U.S. and its western allies will recognize an independent Kurdish state. Turkey will then take over Kurdistan and oil will be shipped to the U.S. and Israel through Turkey. Iran is then poised to obtain the immense oil fields in Rumaila in southern Iraq. But the U.S. and Israel and their allies want control. The rationale behind the threats aimed at Iran exists mainly for this reason, not because of a fear of nonexistent nuclear weapons. It is possible that Iraq, as a nation, will no longer exist.

Though the nation of Iraq may alter, the people and their culture will continue: “On the other hand they [Iraqis] do have a sense of history and of their people having 5000+ years of history living where they do. They express pride and optimism,” Kathy McKay, executive director of Iraq American Reconciliation Project, who lives in Minneapolis, the sister city of Najaf, Iraq, commented on recently returning from a visit to Iraq. “I invite you to join us in ensuring that the next ten years see a strong activation toward peace, friendship, and mutual respect from Americans toward Iraqis.”

Neither Infidel Nor Terrorist

Iraqis never got introduced to the real Americans, the peace-loving Americans. They knew Americans through fighter jets and the military uniform, the attack and the war and invasion. The Arab media call the Americans infidels. Americans call Arabs terrorists, but when you meet each other you find that none of that is true...The small projects we do [together] are very powerful. The main effort is to stop the violence and pave the way for people to develop a peace-loving culture.

Emergency Preparedness, which was attended by 479 participants from 200 agencies.

It is likely that a number of the participants were employees of fusion centers. CAIR, the ACLU, and former Congress members Cynthia McKinney and Bob Barr have all expressed deep concerns about the practices of fusion centers—77 regional intelligence-gathering centers created by the Department of Homeland Security after September 11, 2001. The Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, in a 107-page report released in October 2012, stated that Homeland Security has spent up to $1.4 billion funding fusion centers that have produced “useless” reports while at the same time collecting information that may have violated federal privacy laws on the innocent activities of American Muslims. 8

The subcommittee’s review of draft reports by DHS officials at fusion centers included a report on a list of reading suggestions by a Muslim community group, “Ten Book Recommendations for Every Muslim.” Another report was on a U.S. citizen who was appearing at a Muslim organization to deliver a daylong motivational talk and a lecture on positive parenting.

The fusion center network, in short, has become one of the many funding conduits for the multibillion dollar national security industrial complex. After compiling such a scathing report on fusion centers, the congressional subcommittee only made mild recommendations for changes.

The Islamophobia industry also includes think tanks, foundations, entertainment moguls, training “experts” who advise local police, and frequently the mainstream media—all of which perpetuate the “Muslim as terrorist” and “Muslim to be feared” myths so that the American public will continue to feel the need to be protected.

Creating a perception of Muslims as “the other,” to be feared and mistrusted, enables the military/security/industrial complex to thrive. However, the spread of Islamophobia creates conditions that provoke racial attacks against innocent people. Especially troubling is an increase in the harassment of Muslim children in Minnesota schools—Facebook threats, name-calling, derisive language, physical attacks—causing a hostile environment that affects students academically and emotionally. CAIR-MN says it plans to continue working toward finding positive solutions to these racially charged incidents. CAIR-MN Executive Director Lori Saroya recently announced that CAIR-MN is launching a new program that will include community dialogues on shared civil rights experiences among minority communities in Minnesota. 9 It appears that a threatening visit by the FBI is not going to stop her.

Earth Day News So Hot It’s Radioactive

The New Satyagraha: Bhopal Survivors and Nuclear Resisters Unite

Survivors of the disastrous chemical spill in Bhopal, India, have joined with nuclear resisters in a new Indian satyagraha (Gandhi-defined “soul force”), a nonviolent movement for change. The Kudankulam nuclear generator, about to come online, has been the site of mass protests since August 2011. Last March, more than 250 survivors of the 1984 Union Carbide spill sat in a daylong fast in support of the Kudankulam struggle and to this day have continued their support of nuclear resisters.

Considered one of the world’s worst industrial disasters, the Union Carbide spill exposed over 500,000 people in early December 1984 to methyl isocyanate gas and other chemicals. The government of Madhya Pradesh confirmed 3,787 deaths. Others estimate 8,000 died within two weeks and many thousands have since died from gas-related diseases. After a bitter 25-year court battle, on June 7, 2010, eight former executives of the Indian subsidiary were convicted of negligence. The men were sentenced to two years in prison and fined $2,100. Their original charges carried a maximum sentence of 10 years, but India’s Supreme Court reduced the charges. The company eventually paid the government $470 million to settle the victims’ claims: Only a portion of the money was distributed, in many cases at $550 per recipient.

Public outrage at the light criminal sentences and inadequate recompense has not waned. In recent months the Indian government has tried to “shake off the shadow of Bhopal, an episode that has become synonymous with ineffectual governance and humiliation at the hands of Western capital.” *

“Western capital” is not the only power under Indian public criticism: The reactors at Kudankulam in the southern Indian state (Tamil Nadu) are Russian-designed and many questions remain about their safety, faulty construction, cracks, leaks, and shoddy equipment. They have been under construction since 1988 and are obsolete before they even start up. Three million people live within 18 miles of these reactors. As of early February 2013, protests had intensified, despite a government crackdown. Men, women, and children from several nearby villages are heading a campaign to stop the nuclear plant. The villagers say they have faced media propaganda, government corruption, threats, prohibitory orders against public meeting, police abuse, cases of sedition in courts, and arrest warrants. Public agitation increased after the disaster at Fukushima. Says S. P. Udayakumar, coordinator, People’s Movement Against Nuclear Energy, “The Indian nuclear authorities have not shared any basic information about the project with the public. They do not give complete and truthful answers on the ‘daily routine emissions,’ the amount and management of nuclear waste, fresh water needs, impact of the coolant water on our sea and seafood, decommissioning costs and effects, Russian liability, and so forth.” *http://topics.nytimes.com/top/news/international/countriesandterritories/india/bhopal/index.html

What a Waste!

Also from the Nuclear Information and Research Source: Replaced a faucet lately? Bought a new belt? Did you check the label? Would it matter? Some small amounts of radioactive metals have been part of common household items—toys, flatware, batteries, buckles—for years, but the “floodgates are about to open.” The U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission is legalizing the “clearance” of radioactive materials from regulated control into raw materials, building supplies, and ordinary household objects (http://www.nirs.org/radwaste/recycling/releasebrochure.htm).

The recycling process is cheaper than treating such materials as the radioactive waste they are. Companies make a profit by selling contaminated metals to steel and scrap metal recyclers and manufacturers. In the U.S., nuclear plants and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and Department of Energy are working hand in hand to increase the amount of radioactive “recycling,” weaken protection standards, and allow utilities to conduct incomplete cleanup of contaminated sites.

As William Boardman, Reader Supported News, reports, the plan is largely unnoticed. An alert congressman, Rep. Edward Markey of Massachusetts, noted an inadequate public response period this past January and raised the alarm (http://readersupportednews.org/opinion2/277-75/15908-william-boardman-nuke-the-people).

WAMM Welcomes New Staff

WAMM is delighted to announce the hiring of our new staff members.

Our new director Pepperwolf may not need much introduction to some of you. Pepper has been a long-time activist and organizer in the areas of peace and justice locally and in connection with wider movements.

Among her activities, she helped organize weekly actions and vigils with AlliantACTION, which for years, protested the manufacture of military weapons in Minnesota. She also worked in coalition to lobby the Minnesota legislature regarding depleted uranium. She has led workshop trainings in the spirit of Gandhian nonviolence and organized local groups to participate in the School of Americas Watch (SOA). She has been involved in national actions in Washington, D.C.; at the Pentagon in Arlington, Virginia; at nuclear test sites in Nevada and at Oak Ridge, Tennessee; and Project E.L.F. in Wisconsin.

Locally, she has participated in the antiwar protests of the 2008 RNC in St. Paul, on Highway 55 and Coldwater, MN reroute, and the vigil on the Lake/Street Marshall Avenue Bridge Vigil. With Global Exchange Witness for Peace, she participated in international delegations. Pepper is an experienced professional educator and holds a Master of Arts, Curriculum and Instruction degree from the University of St. Thomas, St. Paul, Minnesota. She has served terms on the WAMM Board of Directors, and worked on many WAMM projects and events. Along with experience, Pepper brings her expertise, dedication and positive spirit to the position of director of Women Against Military Madness.

Our new WAMM office manager is Elina Kolstad. Born and raised in Minneapolis, Elina was in high school when the 9/11 attacks occurred, coming of age in an era of fear mongering and “terror.” With a family history of antiwar protest and political activism, she sought outlets for action, volunteering with WAMM while in high school and later, while at the University of Minnesota, participating in Anti-War Committee events. After graduation, Elina traveled around the world. Now she has found her place doing what she loves—working in an office in support of the peace and justice movement.

You and WAMM

Join a WAMM committee and work on ending war, tackling torture, grounding drones, looking at media, supporting Occupy, among other issues. Or, if you like, you can volunteer at or just attend our events. Some WAMM members are able to offer monetary support. Whatever they may be, your contributions are always greatly appreciated and make our antiwar message stronger. All of it strengthens WAMM.
