

This residence, located in the Crocker Highlands neighborhood in Oakland, involved a restoration of a 1920's home to recapture and recreate the original detailing of the Tudor style house. The house had settled extensively and it was decided to put in an entirely new foundation and re-level the existing house. To the extent possible, existing features were restored to the original construction. Where it was difficult to restore elements that were entirely missing, those elements were recreated within the vocabulary of the original house. All new heating and electrical systems were installed to modern standards. New landscaping was installed to complement the architectural features of the house and the existing mature landscape present on the site.
