A THEOLOGY OF MODERN SLAVERY

INTRODUCTION

In a globalised world in which international travel is commonplace, modern slavery is a global problem. However accurate statistics are hard to come by as so many enslaved people are hidden or invisible. As a result, the true scale of the problem remains unknown.

We assume that all Christians will agree that we should care about this issue. No one should need permission to feel that modern slavery is abhorrent. However, in asking what we can do and what difference we can make, we address three issues for Christian readers to think about:

- How do Christian perspectives give our opposition to modern slavery clarity?
- What theological tools do we have at our disposal to shape a response to the issue of modern slavery?
- What difference will our concern and our response make?

WHAT IS MODERN SLAVERY?

Modern slavery is an umbrella term, mainly used in the UK, to describe all forms of slavery, trafficking, and exploitation.

The Modern Slavery Act of 2015 outlines all forms of slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour that are illegal under UK law, and is a helpful guide if you would like more detail.

Here is a simple illustration of trafficking and slavery: Action + Means + Purpose = Trafficking

Action describes the movement (or lack of) of the person who is being enslaved. They do not have to be moved across a border, international or otherwise. You don’t have to be moved to a different country to be a victim of trafficking.

Means is how they have been persuaded or coerced. This could be with the use of violence, but fraud, deception, and abuse of power, are all viable ways of coercing someone.

And finally, Purpose explains why this person has been moved - for the purpose of exploitation.

Slavery, is almost exactly the same. It only lacks the action. Someone does not have to be moved to be enslaved.

We have only missed out one key part: children. When it comes to children, the Means part of our illustration is irrelevant. Children cannot consent to being exploited in any form, so if someone has the intention of or does enslave a child, that automatically counts as trafficking or slavery.

WHY SHOULD CHRISTIANS SPEAK AND ACT?

A strong response against the abuse of others is an essential part of mission. All Christians are called by God to discern and to respond to God’s mission of love to the world, the Missio Dei.
That activity of God, reconciling the world to God's own self, generates in Jesus Christ, and through the Spirit, the vision of a world in which human beings live in harmony and love, respecting each other and supporting one another. Christians are called to work towards the realisation of such a vision, to make the kingdom of God a reality for everybody. This means that human behaviour which values some people more than others, or which exploits or injures others, is not only contrary to God’s will for human beings, but actively damages his mission. The presence of evil behaviour in the world, and the presence of human and institutional sin, is therefore to be resisted and redressed by all Christians.

BEING HUMAN

Genesis tells us that human beings are made in the image of God, the Imago Dei (Genesis 1.26-27). We can use this powerful idea to understand that all human beings come into being in the same way under God and that God values, desires and loves each person equally. Further, every human being is called by God and cherished by God. It follows that all of us should value, cherish and respect the dignity of every other person, irrespective of their beliefs, ethnic background, economic status, gender or sexual orientation. To refuse to respect others or to treat them as less than fully human is an offence against the Imago Dei and against God. So is any action which deliberately prevents people becoming who God created them to be.

That means that we should not exploit other human beings as property or treat them as commodities. Jesus tells us: love your neighbour as yourself (Mark 12.31). However, while it is easy to say that we would never treat people that way, in fact we often do not live up to what Jesus asks of us. We may not be involved in modern slavery, but we also may contribute to a culture which sees human beings as goods. Modern slavery does not happen in a vacuum but is part of an exploitative culture in which poverty, inequality, oppression, and fear all play their part.

SLAVERY THROUGHOUT HISTORY

It is a distressing fact of human history that slavery has been a common and accepted practice in human power relations, so accepted in fact, that moral questions in theological writing have often focused on an imperative to treat slaves well rather than consider whether the concept of slavery was itself contrary to God’s intention.

Debt bondage was common in Old Testament times but the concept of the sabbatical year and the Jubilee was set against this, creating a time and space during which debt could be written off and bonded slaves released. Against this background, the gospel of Luke says that Jesus read from the passage of Isaiah which proclaims ‘The Spirit of the Lord is upon me,/ because he has anointed me/to bring good news to the poor./He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives/and recovery of sight to the blind,/to let the oppressed go free,/to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favour’ (Luke 4.18-19).

Having read this passage, Jesus, at the start of his public ministry, proclaims this activity of the Spirit to be present in him. His ministry is precisely about the release of captives and freedom from debt bondage, thus freeing people to become part of the Isaiah agenda which is the desire of God. Consequently, if Christians are to follow Jesus and participate in God’s mission of love to the world, then we are required not only to pursue this vision, but actively to work for it. In the New Testament, there is one important example of this active intervention at work.
In Philemon 1. 10-18, Paul writes: ‘I am appealing to you for my child, Onesimus, whose father I have become during my imprisonment. Formerly he was useless to you, but now he is indeed useful both to you and to me. I am sending him, that is, my own heart, back to you. I wanted to keep him with me, so that he might be of service to me in your place during my imprisonment for the gospel; but I preferred to do nothing without your consent, in order that your good deed might be voluntary and not something forced. Perhaps this is the reason he was separated from you for a while, so that you might have him back for ever, no longer as a slave but as more than a slave, a beloved brother—especially to me but how much more to you, both in the flesh and in the Lord. So if you consider me your partner, welcome him as you would welcome me. If he has wronged you in any way, or owes you anything, charge that to my account.’

Paul appears to be appealing to Philemon to consider a change in the power relations between master and slave and to regard Onesimus as a brother - not only as a fellow Christian but also as a human being. Christian faith places a different perspective on the equality of all human beings and Paul seems to want Philemon to recognise this. In order to make this even more possible, Paul offers to pay Philemon compensation so that any debt can be repaid. Christian faith, then, must investigate inequalities of power and lead others to recognise that the persistence of such inequalities is not what God intends for the kingdom. The Church has the opportunity to model relationships to society and culture that are radically different to the status quo.

As Christians Paul’s example, actively intervening for the worth of a human being whom he has got to know and appreciate as a brother, asks us to find out more about those people who are being enslaved and to work to make sure that such injustice is both exposed and stopped. Our communities should model the equality of fellowship that is expected of disciples: ‘There is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male and female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus’ (Galatians 3.28).

SLAVERY AND BODIES

Modern slavery dehumanises people and reduces them to the status of bodies for sale. As Christians, then, we must not only care about the minds and emotions of people like us, made in God’s image, but engage properly with a theology which tells why God has created us as embodied creatures. We have often engaged in social action on the basis of people as thinking, suffering individuals, but modern slavery requires us to engage with what happens to people’s bodies and to understand why what happens to them is wrong. Some Christians are not comfortable with thinking about this and prefer to speak of human rights and privileges as if we lived exclusively in our heads, but we do not. What God wants for human bodies must also be addressed.

SEX AND MARRIAGE

Much modern slavery involves the exploitation of women, men and children for sex. Maya’s story has many typical elements:

Once I came to Mumbai, the dalal sold me to a malik [brothel boss] in Kamathipura. The malik told me I owed him thirty-five thousand rupees [780], and I must have sex with any man who chooses me until this debt is repaid. I refused, and his men raped me and did not feed me...The malik put chilli paste on a broomstick and pushed it inside me. Then he broke my ribs with his fist.1
The idea that a person owes a debt which must be repaid through sex is a common scenario in sexual exploitation, making the victim into someone who is both owned and who owes. Often the person must comply in order to receive food or medical treatment, while disobedience to the demands is met with violent punishment.

Often women come into the hands of the perpetrators by being promised employment or opportunities in another country which will benefit themselves or their families. They find themselves being exploited for sex in a country where they don’t speak the language or have any idea whether they can trust anyone, including the police, to help.

The prophecy of Joel indicates that the sexual exploitation of other human beings in order to have power over them attracts God’s anger and judgement: 'I will enter into judgement with them there, on account of my people and my heritage Israel, because they have scattered them among the nations. They have divided my land, and cast lots for my people, and traded boys for prostitutes, and sold girls for wine, and drunk it down' (Joel 3.2-3). The Bible also has other descriptions of uncontrolled lust leading to rape. Perhaps one of the most violent episodes in Scripture is the rape of the Levite’s concubine in Judges 19 where a mob come to house where the Levite is staying and demand to have sex with him. The host offers up their female property – his own daughter and the Levite’s concubine. The concubine is given to them whom they rape so ferociously that she dies, confirming, as does Maya’s story, that such acts are about power and indiscriminate sexual violence.

The Levite’s response is to cut up the ruined body and send it as evidence of outrage to other tribes of Israel, with a message about the woman’s dismembered body: ‘Consider it, take counsel, and speak out’ (Judges 19.30). This triggers inter-tribal war and extreme, bloody revenge.

Our understanding of a need to respect the body applies here, but in addition, Christian teaching about sex suggests that it must be consensual and flows from, and enhances loving relationships (Genesis 2.24; Mark 10.8-9). In Scripture, the rapes of Dinah (Genesis 34.34ff) and Tamar (2 Samuel 13.22ff), highlight male power and violent force against women who do not reciprocate and who say no. In both cases, the rape is followed by the shame of the woman, a condition of powerlessness much like Maya’s. In both cases, as with the Levite, the response is violent vengeance: male sexual violence begets further violence leading only to death and destruction. We learn from this that raping the bodies of men, women and children, as is common in sexual exploitation, is not only against God’s intention for human sexual behaviour but, in propagating acts of sexual violence, creates a revenge cycle of even more violence and destruction.

Forced marriage is another issue related to modern slavery, as the UK government’s description makes clear: ‘The pressure put on people to marry against their will can be physical (including threats, actual physical violence and sexual violence) or emotional and psychological (for example, when someone is made to feel like they’re bringing shame on their family). Financial abuse (taking their wages or not giving them any money) can also be a factor.’

Shame, coercion and violence are again often symptomatic in forced marriage, and, as the biblical examples show, reduce people to sexual property or commodities whose dehumanisation and powerlessness is clear. Forced marriage often involves deception, such as telling a young person that they are going to visit relatives only to take their passport away until they marry. Such a marriage may have been contracted in order to secure rights to enter another country or to conclude a financial transaction. People in this situation may find themselves stranded in a country they barely know, or end up ill-treated or abandoned. As Christians, we can conclude that this has nothing to do with the picture of mutuality in marriage offered by Jesus, referring to Genesis 1.57 (also Genesis 5.2): “Have you not read that the one who made them at the beginning ‘made them male and female’”, and said, “For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh? So they are no longer two, but one flesh. Therefore what God has joined together, let no one separate.”

3 See www.gov.uk/forced-marriage

In replying to the Pharisees in this way, Jesus refers to the married couple's consensual giving of their bodies to one another as 'one flesh'. Despite the context, in which the Pharisees are trying to test Jesus’s theology on matters of divorce, there is no mention of property being taken and then disposed of, but of mutuality and equality, which prevents one from acting on the other from a position of power. This vision of marriage is entirely at odds with forced marriage which undermines and distorts what God intends for loving human relationships.

This distortion of sex in human relationship is also seen in sexual exploitation for pornography. This raises another issue for us, because this reaches into our homes through the internet. In a society where the media often relays the sexualisation of children and the easy availability of, and right to sex, pornography becomes just another commodity we can opt into if we choose. In a society such as ours, where sex is ubiquitous in entertainment and advertising, it can be all too easy to forget that such an environment requires a continuous supply of new bodies. When our environment is saturated with sexualised images, we can become inured to them, and may forget those whose sexuality is abused for the entertainment of others.

ORGANS

In a back room, the dying woman’s husband met three men. Money changed hands. A lot of money. The husband did not ask too many questions but he was worried about the person who would do the surgery and about who would look after his wife. And he was worried about the authorities. He knew it was illegal but he was desperate. He wondered if they would just take the money and never deliver the kidney.

Four and a half thousand miles away a young man was returning to his village with his goats when a battered truck came down the dirt track behind him. A few seconds later and there was no sign of the man on the road, just the goats nosing in the dust. It was as if he had never been.

The sale did not complete. The traffickers made mistakes with transport and the organs were ruined.

Many people think about trafficking as being about the movement of individual living people, but the World Health Organisation has also highlighted the illegal trade in human organs.

Parts of people may be trafficked, either through selling organs or through coercion and even murder. Hearts, lungs, livers and especially kidneys are harvested for sale to people requiring a transplant. Such a trade requires not only a donor and a recipient but also medical staff and brokers.

4 The sale did not complete. The traffickers made mistakes with transport and the organs were ruined.

The WHO reports that vulnerable, poor and uneducated people are most at risk of being targeted for organ harvesting and that a kidney may sell for as little as $1000. A study of organ sellers in India showed that nearly all sold their organs to get out of debt. Little care is taken of those who are operated on, with many not given any sort of aftercare and unable to afford prescriptions for pain relief.

There are two important issues here for Christians. First, human bodies are not just a collection of tissues and organs, but part of a person's wholeness of body, mind and spirit. The body is part of the way God knows us and interacts with us. The psalmist says: ‘For you formed my inward parts; you knitted me together in my mother's womb. I praise you, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made.’ (Psalm 139.13-14a). God is involved in our flesh and in our becoming and so bodies are to be treated with respect. The injunction in Leviticus 19.28 not to cut or injure the body or to subject it wantonly to a practice that might cause infection or disease reflects this understanding that human beings have a duty to take care of the gift of their physical health. Paul tells the people of the church at Corinth that they too must do this: ‘Or do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, whom you have from God? You are not your own, for you were bought with a price. So glorify God in your body.’ (1 Corinthians 6.19-20). Organ trafficking means pressuring vulnerable and disadvantaged people to put their physical health at risk or even to die.

The second issue for Christians is that the market for trafficked organs could not exist if there were not sick people desperate enough to seek a transplant through this means, which the story above shows. There is a shortage of donated organs and many people survive with reduced quality of life waiting for a transplant. If no donated organ becomes available, then many of those people will die. This is not just a local issue, but a global one with people in rich nations seeking to obtain organs from the poorest. It is not enough to set out a theological understanding of human beings as embodied creatures which says that pressurising people to give up their organs for money is wrong. The other side of the issue is a need for more donated organs.

What does God want for our human bodies? Such a theological enquiry suggests that the body must be kept from harm, respected and treated with reverence as a temple of the Spirit, but that in itself does not mean that organs cannot or should not be donated. Scripture is clear that after death the physical body rots and does not need to be preserved intact. God says in Genesis 3.19 ‘You are dust and to dust you shall return’ and Paul writes that our flesh ‘is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body’ (1 Corinthians 15.44). It can be argued that a natural outworking of the requirement to seek physical health and respect for the body is to make a gift of that body after death to enhance the physical health of others. Because human beings should behave with mutuality, respect and relationship towards each other, as a mirror of the Trinitarian relationship of Father, Son and Holy Spirit, so donating organs after death, where that is possible, is a reconciling and indeed missionary act, showing love and generosity to others. Similarly, voluntarily donating blood and other cells during life, where it is medically safe to do so, shows love for our neighbour and social responsibility. In order to speak out against trafficking in organs, we must also be willing to do more to stop the underground market for such organs.

LABOUR

The book of Isaiah tells us that God's vision for human beings is that ‘They shall build houses and inhabit them;/ they shall plant vineyards and eat their fruit./They shall not build and another inhabit;/ they shall not plant and another eat;/for like the days of a tree shall the days of my people be,/ and my chosen shall long enjoy the work of their hands./They shall not labour in vain,/or bear children for calamity’ (Isaiah 65.21-23).
Raymond Fung tells us that this is the ‘Isaiah agenda’, God’s will for human beings in a reconciled and peaceful existence. It is significant that this aspect of the Missio Dei sees people benefitting from their labour and enjoying the fruits of their work. No one works just to profit another, or works without getting something back.

Labour exploitation is therefore contrary to God’s intention for the world and in fact inverts it.

I was brought up by travellers although I don’t know who my parents were. They were kind to me and looked after me. When I grew up I couldn’t get any work. People don’t like travellers and they don’t like people who are different, like me. I couldn’t read or write so I tried to get labouring jobs.

One day a group of men turned up and said they wanted some strong people for casual labour, bricklaying and that. They seemed to like me. The boss said he’d take me on so I was really glad. But what we basically did was go to another town in the boss’s truck and then go from house to house offering to do things like lay driveways for cheap prices cash in hand. Thing is the boss would set us to work and tell us we had to get the job done by a certain time. We weren’t to speak to anyone or talk about the job – that’s why I was useful. We had to work until dark and sleep in a garage. The boss took all the cash and gave us nothing except some food and cigarettes. When I tried to ask a householder for food and drink I got beaten by the boss, he slapped me and yelled at me. I work all day to lay the bricks really fast, but I get nothing. And now I am a long way from my home and I have nowhere else to go.

In a time where many people have very little spare money, the offer of a cheap job done cash in hand can seem very tempting, especially when the labourers are extremely hard working and fast. It may seem prudent not to ask too many questions. In the case above, when a householder became worried about the workers, the boss threatened her. The problem is that when we succumb to having cheap paved driveways or repairs without checking who the people are who are working for us, we collude with the very conditions that make modern slavery so lucrative.

The perpetrators rely on a conspiracy of silence: we benefit from the labour of others and the bosses benefit most of all. The people who need help cannot get it while we turn a blind eye to their conditions. Yet the Isaiah agenda tells us clearly that we should be bothered about whether people get to enjoy the fruits of their labour and whether people are being treated fairly and without coercion.

RESPONSES

If we understand that modern slavery is entirely wrong and against God’s intention for the lives of human beings in God’s kingdom, then what response should we make?

To answer this question we have to decide whether we are willing to own the problem. Are we really willing to stand up for these people? Further, we have to acknowledge that we may be complicit in the conditions that lead to modern slavery, - a need for cheap goods, an easy acceptance of a sexualised society, a blind eye for people who are not like us and therefore not our problem. Further, we may have little understanding of what it means to live in a globalised society in which people can be transported easily from one part of the globe to another.

Modern slavery takes advantage of technology and economic and power relations between nations. Many people in the UK are concerned about free migration in terms of their own immediate environment and the impact on their lives, but another consequence is the formation of communities where there are many closed groups of people and many languages and cultures present on the same street. Living in such communities has the power to create lively, vibrant, and exciting urban environments, but equally, in some areas, people become isolated within gated communities, afraid of speaking out for fear of retribution, while those who are enslaved get lost in the fast turnover of population and eventually become invisible. Some of these people who live among us may simply disappear. It is in those situations that people learn to exploit the weaknesses of the vulnerable and do so without us noticing. We may rely on other authorities, such as the police, to do the watching for us, unaware that because of the complexities of policing, the need to gather evidence and the interconnectedness of crime, they may not be intervening for the women being exploited in the local brothel. What theological tools do we have, as Christians, which equip us to be more aware of modern slavery in our communities?

Neighbours

Modern slavery is a hidden crime. For this reason, it is important that Christians take seriously the call to know ‘who is my neighbour?’ and to be better neighbours.

Aneeta Prem, founder of the Freedom Charity which was contacted by women who had been kept in forced labour and servitude in London, made the point for us clearly: ‘If we think about our lives, where we’re so busy rushing around - do we know our neighbours? Do we know what’s happening next door? It’s an ordinary street in an ordinary place in London; there’s nothing extraordinary about where they were held, and nobody seemed to know anything about it.’

Jesus offers the parable of the Good Samaritan to teach others about how to be a neighbour even towards people who are unlike us and yet in need of our help. In one of his speeches, Martin Luther King put his finger on one of the contentious issues of the parable – our own deep fear of the consequences of getting involved:

> And so the first question that the priest asked, the first question that the Levite asked was, 'If I stop to help this man, what will happen to me?' But then the Good Samaritan came by, and he reversed the question: 'If I do not stop to help this man, what will happen to him?'

Reframing the question is the only way to answer Jesus’s question ‘who is my neighbour?’ Our neighbour is the Eastern European teenager who comes to the UK to work as a secretary, only to end up being used for sex. Our neighbour is the Somalian boy who is sold to a paedophile ring. Our neighbour is the homeless man who is forced to work on a farm for no pay. These people are all loved and desired by God. They may be nearly invisible so we must develop sharper eyes in order to detect their needs and respond to their difficulties.

8 Martin Luther King ‘I've Been to the Mountaintop’ speech, Memphis, Tennessee, 3rd April 1968 online at www.americanrhetoric.com/speeches/mlkivebeentothemountaintop.htm
Enslaved people need friends but they are not in a position to make any. Yet not all of them are out of sight and some may be coming into contact with us; we just don’t recognise them. For example, unlike the many people rushing past, Christians may take the time and trouble to respond to someone begging, but without realising that the money or food given may go only as a profit to the person controlling them. It takes even more time and effort, 'the extra mile', to talk to them, to see if they will share their story and to detect what else may be behind their having to beg.

For this reason it is important to be aware of the indicators of modern slavery and to use them to sharpen our sense of Christian responsibility towards our neighbours.

THE LORD’S PRAYER

The prayer Jesus gives us sets out a model of behaviour which impacts directly on the conditions giving rise to modern slavery. We ask that God’s kingdom comes so that God’s will, the vision of the Missio Dei, be established 'on earth as it is in heaven'. We must commit ourselves to that vision of mutuality, respect and reciprocity which is characterised by the Trinity in heaven.

A particularly important line in the Lord’s Prayer is ‘forgive us our trespasses/sins’. In some liturgies, the word 'debt' is used since in Matthew, the word ὀφειλήματα means debts in the sense of something owed or an obligation and can also be used metaphorically for that which is owed to God. The Lord’s Prayer continues a vision of mutuality where we seek to release others from debt, just as we ask God to forgive and release us too. In addition to this, Jesus tells us to pray for protection from the evil and ordeal of the world. Not only is this resonant for the victims of modern slavery, but some are additionally subjected to rituals or curses which bind them psychologically and spiritually to those who abuse them. For them deliverance from evil is particularly significant.

Jesus gives us a template for a world without modern slavery while making us aware of the conditions under which it can exist. No Christian can pray the Lord’s Prayer without being prompted to remember the suffering of those whose debts are not forgiven, but who are being trapped in evil situations by others who claim they 'owe' them their bodies or their labour.

WHERE DOES THE EVIL COME FROM?

Disgust and fear are powerful emotions in people's lives and often visited on those we think can contaminate or threaten us. It is no surprise that the word 'dirty' is often used as a term of abuse on beggars and prostitutes.

We see exactly the same reactions in the Bible where the laws governing the behaviour of the people of Israel spelled out how to become and remain pure and how to avoid or recover from defilement (eg Leviticus 11-15). These kinds of laws did not in themselves create the fear and shunning of sources of contamination, but codified human instincts and attempted to create conditions whereby a tent-dwelling community could continue to live together. Yet, despite our modern societies, fear and disgust still attaches to people who are vulnerable and damaged and the knowledge of our attitudes contributes to the depths of their ‘defilement’ and the loss of their humanity. Despite our best intentions, while we may feel happy about giving a beggar money or making cups of tea for the cheap labourers, we may feel less goodwill towards befriending them or finding out their story. Yet, as we have seen, all of them have stories.

Matters of purity and defilement are also concepts which Jesus turns on their heads. Not only does he deliberately seek out and heal people with disease, when asked about defilement, he makes it clear that it is not the body which defiles but the evil intentions within the mind that defile those who perpetrate them (see Matthew 15.18-20). In teaching this, Jesus switches the focus from the powerless to the powerful, the people we have no problems associating with. In reality these are the people we should fear will defile us. Lying, deception and the attempt to exercise power over others for one’s own gain, leads to such defilement. To pretend to be something you are not to gain power over another is both sinful and damaging.

This reminds us that as Christians we should develop a careful attentiveness to see beyond the circumstances of the enslaved people we encounter and not judge them unfairly for what they do or the conditions in which they find themselves. Indeed Christians should be at the forefront of finding them and going out to them, as Jesus did for those shunned in his own community.

Further, we should not be solely concerned with the victims of modern slavery, but also for the perpetrators - both by praying for spiritual change and repentance but also by praying and working for a world in which modern slavery is of no benefit and the Isaiah vision is available to everyone.

OUR RESPONSE TO JESUS AS ‘SLAVE’

Jesus demonstrates his solidarity with those who have no power by himself becoming ‘a slave’ (δοῦλος) and giving up his body to be used by others for their frustration and sense of superiority: it is not just that Jesus is crucified, he is first spat upon and abused for sport by being forced to wear the crown of thorns. Such humiliation is routinely endured by victims of modern slavery.

‘Christ Jesus, who, though he was in the form of God, did not regard equality with God as something to be exploited, but emptied himself, taking the form of a slave, being born in human likeness. And being found in human form, he humbled himself and became obedient to the point of death— even death on a cross’ (Philippians 2.5-8). Jesus says that those who love him would take care of him when he was sick and clothe him if he were naked, yet we so often do not do this for those with whom he identifies (Matthew 25.31-46) ‘just as you did it to one of the least of these who are members of my family, you did it to me’ (v.40).

10 This word is sometimes translated ‘servant’ but there are stronger ties intended: the word used refers to a (male) slave, a bonded person, someone who belongs to another.
WHAT DIFFERENCE CAN OUR CONCERN AND THEOLOGICAL RESPONSE MAKE TO VICTIMS OF MODERN SLAVERY?

SANCTUARY

On 21st November 2013, Aneeta Prem said that the three women her Freedom Charity had helped escape from thirty years’ of forced labour had finally contacted someone in the outside world for help because they had seen her on TV and felt they could trust her. For many victims of modern slavery, part of the problem is that they trust no one and believe no one can be trusted. So even if they are allowed out or escape their situation they may say nothing or simply return to their abusers as they are the only people they can rely on for food and shelter. Those who are illegal immigrants or asylum seekers may be too afraid of being arrested or abused by the authorities to seek help or even know how to go about doing so. In addition, victims of modern slavery may need someone of the appropriate gender to talk to and need to feel that they will not be judged or condemned for the things which have happened to them. In the Church of England, every parish priest has a duty of care for the people who live in the parish and all Christians should reflect a pastoral concern for our neighbours. The Church needs to be a place where a person of any background, faith or culture can ask for help and protection and be confident of receiving it. What does it take for people to learn to trust us? Does our faith sharing and outreach stop short of people like the victims of modern slavery? What does it take for such people to risk contact with us? What messages must we send out that we are a people who can and will help?

She was working in bedroom above a shop in the city. Other girls used the other upstairs rooms. They weren’t supposed to talk to each other. Clients would come into the newsagent, buy something and then ask to go upstairs. The person on the till pressed a buzzer and a man came and took the money.

After a particularly violent episode she felt she couldn’t stand it anymore. Her minders told her she would go to prison, but she didn’t care. Sometimes, if they saw how cut and bruised she was, the minders gave her alcohol or drugs, but mostly they just threatened her. If she craned her neck looking out of the window she could just see a church at the end of the street. She saw women and children gathering outside it. She wondered what they were doing and wished she could be like them.

She limped down the stairs and told her minders that she needed some antiseptic from the shop. When they went to get it, she slipped out of the back door and ran to the end of the street and over to the church. She expected someone to call the police and to be arrested and beaten as she had been told.
But loving hands took her in. Two sisters from a local religious order were running a group for young mothers and children. The sisters and the mothers talked kindly to her and promised to help. They dressed her injuries and took care of her. Later she was able to trust the sisters to liaise with the authorities. While her papers were being sorted the religious order found her accommodation and support. The other women from above the shop were found and taken in as well.

One concept which might be used in the effort to care for the victims of modern slavery today is that of sanctuary. From the 4th century to the 17th century, people who were pursued by the law could be protected by the church if they asked for sanctuary on its premises. People understood the church to be a place of safety and trusted the minister and church community to protect them, no matter what trouble they were in or what they might have done.

This places Christians between the accused and their accusers in order to create a breathing space for reconciliation and find a path to a better outcome. This is what Jesus does in the case of the woman taken in adultery (John 7.53-8.11). Victims of modern slavery are desperately in need of sanctuary, not as an alternative to medical care, legal advice or access to social welfare, but as a breathing space where they can feel safer and as a first step to being freed from their situation. The Freedom Charity provided such sanctuary for the women and it is often the case that it is these kinds of charities which provide sanctuary for those in need. Such charities certainly need our support. Yet surely all Christians should be involved in making it known also that the Church is a place of sanctuary, where people can be helped without conditions being placed on them.

In Scripture, trust is built up by the witness of those devoted to God, through acts of generosity, healing, and care. Such witness through loving service is one of the most important marks of mission because it gives those who need our protection the confidence that if asked, we will provide it. Yet too many people believe that Christians collude with powerful structures and institutions for our own ends and to preserve our own privileges. If that view is to be challenged, Christians must work even harder to build up faithful, trusting relationships, and the Church demonstrate effectively that it keeps its promises to the vulnerable and those in need.

MINISTRY IN THE GAP

Just as Jesus went out of his way to befriend and to help those beyond the fringes of society, so we must be prepared to find and care for those who are being kept in chains out the sight of ‘decent’ people. Jesus was prepared to give love to those deemed unclean by his own religious friends and make himself unclean in ministering to them. Such ministry liberates the person who is suffering and gives the person’s integrity and autonomy back to them.

Throughout Scripture the poor and vulnerable cry out to God, not in helplessness and despair but in the expectation and faith of a God who saves. As Christians, living in obedience to Jesus’ request to all of us to feed his sheep (John 21.17) that expectation rests with us. It requires us to minister in the gap between those in modern slavery and the authorities they fear; to be their voices, until those men, women and children can emerge from the shadows, helped, restored and able to tell their story.
CONCLUSION

Working to combat modern slavery is the responsibility of all of us. We need to educate others about why modern slavery is a crime, not just against our communities, but also against God’s desire for human beings. There is a need to be more aware of our God-given responsibilities to be people who can be trusted, people who are aware of the sufferings of others and ready and willing to give voice and assistance to those who are invisible even in plain sight. It is also a mission imperative, not just to work for justice, but to change the world; to create a world of equity and abundance as envisioned by Isaiah, in which the misery of modern slavery is impossible.

- Be reported missing by their employer even though they are still living in their employer’s house
- Never or rarely leave the house for social reasons
- Never leave the house without their employer
- Be given only leftovers to eat
- Be subjected to insults, abuse, threats or violence

People who have been trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation may:
- Be of any age, although the age may vary according to the location and the market
- Move from one brothel to the next or work in various locations
- Be escorted whenever they go to and return from work and other outside activities
- Have tattoos or other marks indicating "ownership" by their exploiters
- Work long hours or have few if any days off
- Sleep where they work
- Live or travel in a group, sometimes with other women who do not speak the same language
- Have very few items of clothing
- Have clothes that are mostly the kind typically worn for doing sex work
- Only know how to say sex-related words in the local language or in the language of the client group
- Have no cash of their own
- Be unable to show an identity document
The following might also indicate that children have been trafficked:

- There is evidence that suspected victims have had unprotected and/or violent sex.
- There is evidence that suspected victims cannot refuse unprotected and/or violent sex.
- There is evidence that a person has been bought and sold.
- There is evidence that groups of women are under the control of others.
- Advertisements are placed for brothels or similar places offering the services of women of a particular ethnicity or nationality.
- It is reported that sex workers provide services to a clientele of a particular ethnicity or nationality.
- It is reported by clients that sex workers do not smile.

LABOUR EXPLOITATION

People who have been trafficked for the purpose of labour exploitation are typically made to work in sectors like the following: agriculture, construction, entertainment, service industry and manufacturing (in sweatshops).

People who have been trafficked for labour exploitation may:

- Live in groups in the same place where they work and leave those premises infrequently, if at all
- Live in degraded, unsuitable places, such as in agricultural or industrial buildings
- Not be dressed adequately for the work they do: for example, they may lack protective equipment or warm clothing
- Be given only leftovers to eat
- Have no access to their earnings
- Have no labour contract
- Work excessively long hours
- Depend on their employer for a number of services, including work, transportation and accommodation
- Have no choice of accommodation
- Never leave the work premises without their employer
- Be unable to move freely
- Be subject to security measures designed to keep them on the work premises
- Be disciplined through fines
- Be subjected to insults, abuse, threats or violence
- Lack basic training and professional licences

The following might also indicate that people have been trafficked for labour exploitation:

- Notices have been posted in languages other than the local language.
- There are no health and safety notices.
- The employer or manager is unable to show the documents required for employing workers from other countries.
- The employer or manager is unable to show records of wages paid to workers.
- The health and safety equipment is of poor quality or is missing.
- Equipment is designed or has been modified so that it can be operated by children.
- There is evidence that labour laws are being breached.
- There is evidence that workers must pay for tools, food or accommodation or that those costs are being deducted from their wages.
BEGGING AND PETTY CRIME

People who have been trafficked for the purpose of begging or committing petty crimes may:

- Be children, elderly persons or disabled migrants who tend to beg in public places and on public transport
- Be children carrying and/or selling illicit drugs
- Have physical impairments that appear to be the result of mutilation
- Be children of the same nationality or ethnicity who move in large groups with only a few adults
- Be unaccompanied minors who have been "found" by an adult of the same nationality or ethnicity
- Move in groups while travelling on public transport: for example, they may walk up and down the length of trains
- Participate in the activities of organised criminal gangs
- Be part of large groups of children who have the same adult guardian
- Be punished if they do not collect or steal enough
- Live with members of their gang
- Travel with members of their gang to the country of destination
- Live, as gang members, with adults who are not their parents
- Move daily in large groups and over considerable distances

The following might also indicate that people have been trafficked for begging or for committing petty crimes:

- New forms of gang-related crime appear.
- Evidence that the group of suspected victims has moved, over a period of time, through a number of countries.
