The Prophecy, David Bates—The two inscriptions are written in Greek, and appear to belong to the same period. They are in the form of letters, and are written in a semi-circular arrangement. The writer presents the leading ideas of the prophecy in a bold manner, and the main points in the text are illustrated by the use of symbols and figures. The whole of the prophecy is explained in detail in the notes of the manuscript, which is characterized by a freedom of expression and a vividness of style, which has been noted by all who have read it.

Theodore—We give the following account of the expedition of the English fleet to the Mediterranean, in the year 1370.

The fleet sailed from Bristol, under the command of Sir William de la Pole, and arrived in the Mediterranean on the 1st of July. The fleet consisted of 15 ships, under the command of Sir William de la Pole, and the expedition was entered upon without any serious opposition.

The expedition was a success, and Sir William de la Pole was made a Knight of the Bath. The fleet returned to England on the 1st of August, having captured several vessels and taken a number of slaves.
