U.S. Sen. Richard Blumenthal has called on the Department of Health and Human Services to reverse a Trump-era rule that cut over 6,000 disabled Connecticut residents off from Medicaid benefits this year.

“It might sound like an arcane and difficult legal issue but as a matter of humanity it's pretty straightforward: do the right thing,” said Senator Blumenthal on the south lawn of the Capitol building Thursday morning. “The president of the United States can undo Donald Trump's harm to people with disabilities by the stroke of a pen.”
Two disabled Connecticut women sued the Department of Health and Human Services for cutting their Medicaid benefits based on a rule minted in the final hours of the Trump administration.

Last week the legal case was escalated. The legal team of Disability Rights CT is seeking class-action status so that they can represent people from all over the country who were cut from Medicaid.
“This is a national problem,” said Sheldon Toubman, the lead attorney on the suit. He said he had heard from disabled people in Nebraska and Delaware that they had lost their benefits under the rule change. “We filed for certification of a nationwide class for everybody who was affected by the same Trump rule. We estimate to be several hundred thousand people.”

Their legal advocates say that the rule change violated the 2020 Coronavirus Response Act which mandated that people remain on the Medicaid rolls during the COVID-19 public health emergency, which is still ongoing.

A hearing is scheduled later in the month where a judge will decide whether or not to halt the enforcement of the Trump-era rule.

Blumenthal said hopes that the Department of Health and Human Services renders the whole question moot by tossing it out entirely. He has asked them to respond to him by September 9.

“They could say, you're right. Trump blew it,” said Senator Blumenthal. “They could just say, okay we'll reinstate your benefits.”
