How can education meet the world we’re living in?

The education we experience plays a huge role in our lives — most often shaping the way we think and act. In my personal experience, the education I had growing up didn’t prepare me for the changing world that we’re living in, but instead for the dominant social and cultural constructs of the system. In turn, this hindered me from exploring my authentic self and interests.

Education can meet the world we’re living in by accepting the entirety of each student that embraces their individual uniqueness. A place where it’s safe to express all of our emotions and explore our creativity, where we can feel supported and empowered to have authentic relationships with ourselves and with others.

Marika is a graduate of the Ecological Design Thinking Masters programme at Schumacher College. She is working to support transformative education, social emotional learning and regenerative practices. She works as a freelance team member on our curriculum design and project coordinator teams. Marika is Japanese-American and is currently living in the Netherlands.