A NEW START

To the head of the class

A remarkable rise, from juvenile hall to promising new teacher.

First of two parts.

Quamiir Trice was a 15-year-old high school sophomore with a report card full of Fs when his time as a Philadelphia School District student abruptly ended: Arrested for selling crack, he was banned to the city's juvenile justice center. Trice completed his new-educator orientation Friday. In a few weeks, he steps before a class full of fourth-graders at Sodeman Elementary in North Philadelphia.

"I'm not running away from my past," Trice said. "I'm running into it." That attitude, Trice said, came complete with mentors, personal guidance, and a new plan: the Freshman Fellowship youth enrichment program, and multiple college degrees. "I'm using it as a teaching tool." - By Kristin A. Graham

With Point Breeze and Newbold bustling with new development on the west side of Philadelphia and East Passyunk on the east, it’s surprising that a corridor as large as South Broad Street has only recently drawn interest from large city developers.

Beyond early investments such as Carl Dranoff’s 777 South Broad apartments in 2010 and Southstar Lofts in 2014, the South Philadelphia boulevard otherwise has remained home to gas stations, drive-through restaurants, empty lots, and spotty development.

But developers have taken more interest recently. Two large, mixed-use projects are moving ahead at Broad Street and Washington Avenue. One, called Lincoln Square, by Alterra Property Group and MIS Capital, is slated to bring more than 300 apartments, with a mix of retail, offices, and amenities.
