New York – For the second long-term installation presented in the Lab Corridor, The Drawing Center presents a site-specific installation by the Santa Fe-based artist Susan York, which references the internal structure of the museum’s 35 Wooster Street building. Using graphite as a sculptural rather than a two-dimensional medium, York created replicas of parts of the museum’s foundation: irregular granite piers that protrude above the museum’s ground floor. Four graphite drawings, each mirroring the appearance of a pier, hang alongside York’s sculptural works, strengthening the ties between drawing and sculpture in her practice. York’s long-term installation initiates an expanded field of activity at The Drawing Center, offering an opportunity to explore drawing as an interactive and socially-minded practice. By bringing attention to The Drawing Center’s building, York’s installation encourages discussion about the importance of museums as public spaces with historical and physical presence. Organized by Amber Harper, Assistant Curator.

ABOUT SUSAN YORK

Active since the 1980s, Susan York’s work brings attention to overlooked architectural details by strategically positioning monolithic, cast graphite planes and cubes adjacent to corners, moldings, and light wells. Recent solo exhibitions of her work have been mounted by the Georgia O’Keeffe Museum, Santa Fe; Sheldon Art Museum, Lincoln, Nebraska; Santa Fe Art Institute; and the Lannan Foundation, Santa Fe. Her work has also been included in group exhibitions at 308@156 Project Artspace, New York, and the Mies van der Rohe Haus, Berlin, among many others.
