AN OPEN LETTER TO GEORGE WERNER, MINISTER OF EDUCATION, LIBERIA

We are writing to express deep concern about both your reluctance to permit independent research of the Partnership Schools for Liberia pilot programme and your rush to expand the pilot before evidence is available.

Education International, with support from ActionAid, commissioned an independent research team from the University of Wisconsin to conduct qualitative research which was designed to complement the Randomised Control Trial evaluation that is already underway in Liberia with the Center for Global Development in partnership with Innovations for Poverty Action. We understand that, having indicated your support for this complementary research, you withdrew that support at the last moment (just as the researchers were due to fly to Liberia) and will not now permit the researchers to access the pilot schools.

The Partnership Schools for Liberia pilot has a very high profile internationally and warrants detailed study. We understand that a lot has been invested in the Randomised Control Trial (RCT) evaluation, but no single evaluation, however well-designed, will ever provide a comprehensive picture of a pilot programme as complex as the one you have initiated. By blocking independent research, you are depriving the academic and policy community important opportunities to fully understand this pilot.

It is our view that permitting and facilitating independent academic inquiry is a precondition for transparency and good governance, particularly when you are seeking to challenge established practices and norms.

You will be aware of the widespread concerns about how Bridge International Academies blocked independent research in Uganda and have failed to allow external evaluation of their schools whilst making bold claims for their success based on their own internal data. This is very poor practice and we would be very concerned if the Ministry of Education in Liberia played a role in extending such practices.

Our second major area of concern relates to your plans to scale up the initial pilot programme even before findings from the evaluation and research come through. You have previously gone on record stressing that any scaling up would be subject to the findings from the initial pilot programme —over three years — but you are now planning a significant expansion from September 2017, without any of those findings being ready. This flies in the face of evidence-based policy making and suggests that you are only paying lip-service to the importance of research and evaluation. Such a move makes the pilot programme appear to be one driven largely by ideology. Indeed, it undermines the RCT evaluation as well as the value of any complementary research.

We urge you to move away from this present damaging path, to reassert the importance of using evidence to inform your policy choices and to commit publicly to supporting and facilitating independent research at the start of the new school year in September.

Yours sincerely,

Frank Adamson,
Senior Policy and Research Analyst, Stanford Center for Opportunity Policy in Education (SCOPE)

Gary Anderson,
Professor of Educational Leadership, New York University

Beatrice Ávalos-Bevan,
Associate Researcher, Centre for Advanced Research in Education, University of Chile

Gustavo E. Fischman,
Professor, Mary Lou Fulton Teachers College, Arizona State University

Jasmine Gideon,
Senior Lecturer, Development Studies, Birkbeck, University of London.

David Hursh,
Professor, Warner School of Education, University of Rochester

Heather Jacklin,
Senior Lecturer, School of Education. University of Cape Town.

Sangeeta Kamat,
Professor, International Education, College of Education, University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

Steven J. Klees,
Professor of International Education Policy, University of Maryland

Kenneth Saltman,
Professor, Department of Educational Leadership, University of Massachusetts, Dartmouth

Keith M Lewin,
Professor Emeritus, University of Sussex

Bob Lingard,
Professor School of Education, The University of Queensland

Christopher Lubienski,
Professor of Education Policy, Indiana University

Allan Luke,
Emeritus Professor, Queensland University of Technology

Francine Menashy,
Assistant Professor, University of Massachusetts, Boston

Sara Muller,
School of Education, University of Cape Town

Robert Van Niekerk,
Professor, Matthew Goniwe Chair in Social Policy and Director, Institute of Social and Economic Research, Rhodes University

Antonio Olmedo,
Reader in Education Policy, University of Roehampton

Diane Ravitch,
Research Professor, New York University

Susan L. Robertson,
Professor, Faculty of Education, University of Cambridge

Yusuf Sayed,
Professor, Director Centre for International Teacher Education Cape Peninsula University of Technology
Dennis Shirley,
Professor of Education, Lynch School of Education, Boston College, Massachusetts

Alan Singer,
Director, Secondary Education Social Studies Teaching Learning Technology, Hofstra University

Iveta Silova,
Professor, Mary Lou Fulton Teachers College, Arizona State University

Carol-Anne Spreen,
Associate Professor International Education, New York University

Gita Steiner-Khamsi,
Professor, Teachers College, Columbia University, New York

Howard Stevenson,
Professor of Educational Leadership and Policy Studies, School of Education, University of Nottingham

Nelly P. Stromquist,
H.R.W. Benjamin Professor, International Education Policy Program, University of Maryland

Elaine Unterhalter,
Professor of Education & International Development, University College London

Mathias Urban,
Professor of Early Childhood, University of Roehampton

Antoni Verger,
Associate Professor, Department of Sociology, Autonomous University of Barcelona

Salim Vally,
Associate Professor, Faculty of Education, University of Johannesburg