Ursula senior makes masks to help healthcare workers

Analydia and her Aunt came across this idea when watching a daily briefing from Governor Cuomo together. In it, the governor stated that New York will run out of the medical masks around the month of April. When she learned of that, she and her Aunt discovered a volunteer group that makes masks and sends UPS to collect the masks and delivers them to places that need them.

Although they just started making the masks, Analydia’s goal is to make at least 50 masks per week. She is making the masks in her home and is using material that she ordered online along with clothing that she was willing to donate.

A senior at the Academy of Mount St. Ursula, Analydia said that she is doing this because she cares about the doctors and nurses fighting this war on the disease. To her it is simply the right thing to do.
