Local Craft Highlight SEAGROVE POTTERS

Nestled in the North Carolina countryside mere miles from High Point, the town of Seagrove is home to the largest collective of working potters in the United States—Seagrove Potters. The area's rich ceramic history pre-dates European settlers, with Native potters creating functional and ceremonial objects using the region's abundant natural clay deposits. English and German immigrants began crafting redware as early as 1700, transitioning to higher-fired salt-glazed stoneware by the early 1800s. As railroads expanded, so did Seagrove's reputation as a hub for pottery production. Today, with over 80 members, Seagrove Potters stands as an internationally renowned continuation of the local ceramics legacy in North Carolina.

Shope Object High Point thanks the North Carolina Pottery Center for making this exhibition possible.
