Community Collaboration, Raising Awareness, and New Opportunities

Katie: We wanted to do something different for this year’s annual report. Rather than having a long letter from each of us, I thought our readers would appreciate hearing an open and candid conversation about our partnership.

Paul: I would have preferred a music video of us.

Katie: It’s an annual report, Paul—there’s always next year. So, I just returned from Washington D.C., where I attended the bi-annual Friends Alliance meeting for the National Parks. It struck me that when I’m in DC talking to groups, it’s very clear who we are and what our relationship is with the park. Locally, though, we struggle to explain what a “friends group” is. How do you answer that question?

Tricia: When I tell people about the fund, I talk about how it’s our goal to support the park through fundraising and other resources and build the community using the park as a venue.

Paul: I like to say that the Mississippi River Fund is a Friend with a capital “F.” You help us accomplish more through fundraising and raising awareness. We’ve organized around our affection for this great national park.

Katie: That’s a great way to put it, Paul. We have a lot coming up in the next couple of years. What projects are you most excited about?

Paul: The Coldwater site demolition and restoration is an exciting project. Soon, we’ll be able to show people a restored oak savannah on the Mississippi River, at a site owned by the National Park Service.

The Asian carp issue is another big one—that’s a potentially large ecological threat to the river. We’re coordinating many folks on this issue. We don’t know yet where it’s going to go, but the issue is important and we’re right in the center of it.

Tricia: I echo what Paul said about the exciting future of the park and the fund, but in a different way. As friends of the park, I think it is our moment to build awareness and help people realize the opportunity to experience one of the best parts of the city—after all, we have an urban national park right here.

While the Asian carp issue is a foreboding challenge, it’s also raising awareness for the river and the park. Sometimes it’s through crisis that people begin to appreciate and rally around opportunity.
Katie: As the park’s charitable partner, I am excited to help move projects forward, like the Coldwater site, trail development, and land and habitat restoration for wildlife and the public. These projects are not only for the public who will visit, but for people who end up taking ownership of these places through volunteer opportunities.

Tricia: Volunteerism with the fund and the park is on a great trajectory. Minnesotans have always been strong advocates for volunteerism. Having a venue for more people to participate in the park’s work is fabulous. There are so many opportunities and the benefits for the river will be tremendous.

Katie: Tricia, one of the things I think our readers will want to know is what inspires you to spend so much of your time with the fund and the park?

Tricia: There are two things for me. First, the decisions I’ve made in my life about where I spend my time are focused on people who want to make a difference with their actions. When I found the opportunity to work with the fund and the park, that’s exactly what I found.

The other thing is that I hit my 40s and realized that community involvement and participation is really a responsibility. This is one way I can give back to my community in an area that is very important to me.

Katie: Is there anything else you want to make sure is heard by our readers?

Paul: Without gushing, I just want to hug the Mississippi River Fund for enabling us to do things we would never be able to do with federal funding alone. Your ability to raise our capacity to deliver great programs and attract new partners is critical. You are able to broker new relationships that help us grow immensely.

Katie: Well, the feeling is mutual, Paul. Our partnership allows us to attract community and philanthropic leaders who know they can make a difference by supporting the fund because of our partnership with the National Park Service.

Now it’s time to let our readers learn more about our partner projects by exploring the rest of the annual report. Thanks, Paul and Tricia.
The best part about volunteering at the Mississippi River Visitor Center is something most people just walk over without a glance.

I love sitting on the floor with visitors, pinpointing precisely where their house is on our floor graphic of the park. Some find their house and go. But often, once home is spotted, visitors begin to see more. They see the connection between their lives and the national park in our backyards. Sitting on the floor, they tell river stories—the heron they saw last week, their fishing trips, their latest walk across the Headwaters.

Volunteering with the park and the Mississippi River Fund lets me see the river coursing through our community. It’s been a gift for me to see so many others who consider the river, our urban park, as innate as the air we breathe and the trails we walk.

Some people think volunteering is about giving to others. It’s true, volunteers like me give our time and we do help, but we get more than we give. I’ve acquired more knowledge about the river, and more connections with people I like to be with, and more chances to see how this national park is a bridge, linking people and the river.

PROGRAM HIGHLIGHTS & ACCOMPLISHMENTS
REI and the Mississippi River Fund have been strong partners for years now. It has been such a rewarding experience to see the impact we’ve had on the community together, from local events, classes, programs, and product donations, to supporting the fund’s River Action Volunteer Events (RAVEs) through grants from REI. The RAVEs are so unique in that they combine a volunteer opportunity with an outdoor recreation experience. I love the model for this program and am very proud REI is able to help support it.

Last winter, REI also donated our rental snowshoes to the Mississippi River Fund. I wanted to find a local partner that would be willing to start a snowshoeing program to serve the community, and the fund came to mind right away. The donation worked out beautifully and now the National Park Service has made the program a reality.

In addition to developing a great working partnership, I truly value the friendships I have made through the fund and all that we are able to accomplish together.
I direct Macalester College’s Katharine Ordway Natural History Study Area along the Mississippi River in Inver Grove Heights. Our partnership with the Mississippi River Fund and the National Park Service has been immensely important and has helped the Ordway Field Station with all four pillars of its mission: education, civic engagement, research, and sustainability. The fund made it possible for us to host the 2011 Minnesota BioBlitz, a wonderful scientific festival in which approximately 100 people cataloged over 500 species, in conjunction with a RAVE river cleanup event. The BioBlitz was 24 hours of education, community engagement, and research all wrapped into one amazingly fun event. The fund provided volunteers, leadership, crucial connections with the park and its rangers, facilitating cooperation with other partners, and funding through a grant from Patagonia. We are building on the success of our relationship by working with the fund and the park to develop a strategic partnership that will allow us to increase cooperative outreach and scientific research in our section of the park. It has been a great year and the future of our collaboration looks even brighter!
