Why Is the Right Launching an Attack?

Notably, CRT is not (nor ever has been) widely taught in US high schools.

Only 56% of American high schoolers report discussing race at all in the classroom (much less critical race theory).

So why is the Right trying to ban CRT?
Why Is the Right Launching an Attack?

According to the Washington Post, the culture war against CRT has effectively mobilized conservative voters.

By fueling fears and misconceptions of CRT, the Right has “paint[ed] Democrats as ‘extreme.’”

Many don’t understand what CRT is, “but viewed it as part of a broader cultural shift they feared.”

Their key arguments & our responses
Criticism 1: “CRT is Anti-White”

By asking white people to acknowledge “white privilege”

Critics allege that CRT villainizes white people

And unfairly implies that “all white people are racist”
Our Response:

CRT recognizes that this country was built upon the oppression of BIPOC people,
And that white people have inherent systemic privileges.

But by focusing on systemic flaws, it does the opposite of blaming white individuals for inequality –
It provides a framework for us to work together and rebuild in better ways.
Criticism 2: “CRT is Too Divisive”

By focusing on the ugly parts of America’s history, from slavery to the Jim Crow era,

Critics argue that CRT further divides us along lines of racial identity

And prevents us from “moving on” from the past
Our Response:

Identity politics – approaching politics from the perspective of a group, rather than as an individual – is a source of strength and community for marginalized people.

As it allows us to realize that the violence affecting us is “part of a broad-scale system of domination” rather than “isolated and individual.”
