Project Summary
The Franklin County Board of Commissioners has committed to aiding early childhood providers and families with young children by making a historic investment of approximately $23 million in the Franklin County RISE initiative. This "whole system approach" is funded by Franklin County and the City of Columbus, and is administered by Action for Children. Action for Children is a local child care resource and referral agency that provides services to families throughout central Ohio. Statements released by the Commissioners indicate the funds will be allocated for the following purposes:

- early learning scholarships up to $10,000 for families with incomes between 142% to 300% of the federal poverty line;
- incentive payments for licensed child care centers and family child care homes; and
- rental support for child care workers.

This investment comes at a critical time for many families who were left without access to high-quality care during the COVID-19 crisis. Franklin County RISE will benefit those who do not qualify for publicly funded child care but are otherwise unable to afford care. This investment is also highly beneficial for educators and providers. One in six child care centers were forced to close their doors during the pandemic. Incentives built into this initiative will provide essential financial assistance to remaining providers.

Local Perspective

Unique Challenges
Franklin County staff members praised their commissioners for their efforts in prioritizing child care investments at the local level and also expressed a desire for more financial support from the state of Ohio to expand their work. Bart Logan, deputy director of communications at Franklin County Department of Job and Family Services, notes that more county-state collaboration is needed to expand access to child care resources and services; however, the state needs to provide more resources.
Ensuring Accountability
Action for Children is considered the best entity to administer funds and, ultimately, the county is committed to ensuring that the organization disburses dollars in an equitable and compliant manner. The current contract between the county and Action for Children is valid for one year with the option to renew for a second year so long as the program runs smoothly. Franklin County and Action for Children staff currently meet weekly to discuss RISE Initiative’s pain points and determine plans of action to resolve them. This is one way stakeholders can maintain effective implementation.

Jennifer Walton, communications consultant with the RISE Initiative, further highlights the program’s commitment to transparency with the general public. Her team is responsible for determining the best strategy for Franklin County’s Board of Commissioners to communicate scholarship and incentive rewards to its audience of families and providers, respectively.

Lessons Learned
Franklin County staff emphasize the importance of community input in driving American Rescue Plan allocation decisions. Moriah Lieberman, policy director for Commissioner Erica Crawley at Franklin County Board of Commissioners, specifically notes that the county established a child care support team to develop recommendations for investments, which ultimately became the basis for the RISE Initiative. In a conversation about equity, Lieberman explains that maintaining an equity lens is critical when approaching this work as it ensures children across a wide range of providers will be served. Logan and Walton add that data monitoring and evaluation is an important piece to the equity discussion. Data reveals the extent to which families and providers are being served and whether the program meets the outcomes it was developed to achieve.
