From the outset, this curriculum guide was meant to be a collaborative effort. Medill School of Journalism graduate students Ryan Holmes and Satvika Khera and Medill undergraduate student Jacob Meschke were the first researchers, providing a foundation that was enormously important in shaping the final outcome of the curriculum guide.

Thanks also to Satvika Khera and Medill graduate student Xuanyan Ouyang for producing videos for the guides.

Journalists Louise Roug, Tom Hundley, Amanda Mustard and David Rohde generously offered their time and expertise to provide the real-life experiences needed for Seminars 2 and 3.

Medill graduate student Shahzeb Hashiam and James W. Foley Legacy Foundation Program Director Tom Durkin provided invaluable work in completing Seminar 4.

Medill graduate student Jingnan Huo was the lead researcher and writer for Seminar 5. Frank Smyth of Global Journalist Security and Dovran Balyshov of CommunityRed provided invaluable advice and guidance.

I am grateful to the Medill National Security Journalism Initiative and the Medill School of Journalism for providing me, through my research commitment as William F. Thomas Professor and as co-director of the national security program, with the time needed to lead the effort to create this curriculum guide.

A special thanks to Diane Foley, founder of the James W. Foley Legacy Foundation, for believing that it is crucial to inform future journalists about the risks and safety measures needed for conflict reporting. Her support and expertise were crucial to the success of this endeavor.

The enthusiasm, dedication and expertise of the other co-sponsors – the Facebook Journalism Project, Reporters Without Borders and U.S. Director Delphine Halgand, A Culture of Safety (ACOS) and Emma Beals of Frontline Freelance Register – helped ensure the guide is deep and wide-ranging in the research and supporting material offered to instructors and students.
